Instead of massing their argument behind the British foreign secretary, the American opponents of the exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of Panama Canal tolls would do better to concentrate on points more likely to have effect on Congress. Prating that the national honor will be sullied by running our own shipping in our own trade through our own canal in our own way will not have overwhelming effect on national policy.

The strong points are that the exemption is a subsidy, and that a new monopoly should not be created when the country is trying to extinguish monopoly. Congress is afraid of the subsidy and monopoly cries. It has little fear of clamor backing the proposition that any other nation can tell us what not to do in our own affairs. Sentiment for the repeal of the exemption for our own purposes is easier to arouse than sentiment for yielding to British pressure to suit British purposes.

KNOX'S REPLY TO ENGLISH GOVERNMENT.

American public opinion is so fully convinced that this country is in the right in the canal-tolls dispute with England, and has such well-grounded suspicions that the whole English contention is in the interest of the English stock and bondholders in the Canadian Pacific and other Pacific railroads, that popular interest in the notes exchanged between the foreign offices of the two countries is not keen.

CANAL LEGISLATION.

In suggesting the repeal of the exemption clause in the canal bill Mr. ROOT asks something more than Congress can do without, in a measure, stultifying itself. The way out of the difficulty that has arisen is clearly through arbitration, and considering that our Government stands practically pledged to the arbitration principle, it will be strange if Congress should demur to this mode of settlement. The first consideration is to maintain the national prestige by making good a treaty obligation deliberately contracted. The time for discussing the advisability of undoing that obligation will come later on.

NOTHING TO ARBITRATE.

Good for Philander Knox. Good Americans will agree with him he is right, in his reply to Sir Edward Grey in the matter of the Panama Canal tolls, in bluntly declaring our Government does not agree with the Grey interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote or Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

* * * * * * *

We have had too much Tory toadyism and maudlin peace in the Panama Canal business. The canal is an American enterprise, built with American money and on American soil, and the American Republic proposes to rule and govern the canal without foreign advice or interference, as long as we stand within our rights and international law.

SHOULD DISCUSS THE TREATY.

Of Secretary Knox's note replying to the British complaint that the Panama Canal act violates the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the Pall Mall Gazette says:

"Coming from any other country than the United States Mr. Knox's reply would be deeply resented. We know, however, that American statesmen never have caught the trick of diplomatic courtesy as it is understood in Europe, so therefore we are indisposed to lay stress upon mere crudeness of language."

* * * * * * *

Another London newspaper, the Westminster Gazette, says, "Mr. Knox's reply does not bolt the door, but it scarcely can be said to be satisfactory."

Well, what would have been satisfactory? An admission by the American Secretary of State that the Panama Canal act does contravene the treaty and a promise forthwith to repeal it? Or immediate acceptance of the British proposal of arbitration without any effort to attain a diplomatic settlement? Apparently from the British standpoint only that is satisfactory which is favorable to Great Britain.

WHY ALL THIS HULLABALOO?

Secretary Knox's reply to the British protest against the Panama Canal law whittles the points in dispute down so small that one is inclined to exclaim, "Why all this hullabaloo?"

* * * * * * *

Had not the interests of Canadian railroads in poaching on American commerce been adversely affected there would have been no British protest. Had not American financiers seen that toll exemption would intensify water competition with transcontinental railroads they would not have backed the protest. The controversy is not really between the American and British Governments; it is between the American people on the one side and the railroads, Canadian and American, on the other, which are using the British Government to fight their battles.

KNOX SETTLES THE PANAMA TOLLS.

Those newspapers that have been upholding the British and the American railroad idea of our national obligations at Panama have been laughably put out of countenance by the reply of Secretary Knox to the clumsy note of protest from the British foreign minister. The Secretary completely riddles the British pretensions, knocks the Root logic into smithereens, and takes all the starch out of the Tory newspapers. It is diverting to read their editorial comments on the Secretary's reply, which really leaves them nothing to say, for it exposes all their sham sentiment and convicts them either of imbecility or unpatriotic motive to sacrifice the national interests in the Panama Canal to foreign dictation and corporate greed at home. Secretary Knox's exposition of the case virtually settles it.

Resolution unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce.

Whereas on October 11, 1911, a conference of the Pacific Coast Chambers of Commerce and the Pacific Coast congressional delegation adopted a resolution indorsing the proposition that no tolls be charged through the Panama Canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and

Whereas the board of directors of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, on December 8, 1911, approved the position taken by the conference and adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That no tolls should be charged by the United States Government on vessels using the Panama Canal on voyages between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce hereby expresses itself as in full accord with the position taken by the Hon. Philander C. Knox, Secretary of State, in his reply to the protest of Great Britain against the exemption of American coastwise shipping from Panama Canal tolls.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of resolution unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce on January 31, 1913.

LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
H. Z. OSBORNE, President.

Resolutions adopted by New Orleans Progressive Union, February 9, 1912.

(1) The New Orleans Progressive Union indorses the proposition that American vessels engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

(2) Should it be found necessary that American ships engaged in foreign trade shall pay tollage, the United States Government, by drawback, rebate, or otherwise, shall refund amount to such American vessels.

Resolutions adopted by Central Labor Council of Portland, Oreg., October 10, 1911.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag.

Resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of New York.

Whereas the United States, by act of Congress, passed in 1884, made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: "No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed"; and

Whereas, under that policy, which is still in operation, the United States has expended on local waterway developments nearly $700,000,000 at the general expense of the whole country; and

Whereas the Federal Government, in addition to its vast expenditures of public funds upon internal and seacoast waterways, for the use and benefit of all sections and of all the people, free from imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof, has also made vast grants of public lands of incalculable present value to the transcontinental railways to promote their construction and the interests of the whole country, especially of the sections which they directly serve; and

Whereas the Panama Canal is constructed primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States, and when completed will be of direct commercial benefit to a larger area of the country than any other waterway ever constructed or improved by the Federal Government; and

Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce, which law was in operation and contemplation at the time of the negotiation and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

Whereas the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty appears to relate to the avoidance of discriminations between the nations and therefore does not pertain to our domestic coastwise trade, in the treatment of which there can be no such discrimination as prohibited in said treaty: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the report of the special committee on tolls on coastwise commerce passing through the Panama Canal, dated February 26, 1912, be, and hereby is, approved; and be it further

Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York opposes the proposition of imposing any tolls whatsoever upon the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal, unless it be determined by competent authority that the imposing of such tolls is required in fulfillment of our treaty obligations.

Resolutions adopted by the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, July 12, 1912.

Whereas from present indications the Panama Canal will be ready for use by merchant shipping in about two years' time; and

Whereas it is necessary that those contemplating the operation of vessels through the canal should be informed at the earliest possible moment regarding the regulations that will govern said operation, so that sufficient time will be given to conform with every requirement: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Congress be strongly urged to enact at this session such legislation as will enable the President to fix the tolls to be charged for the use of the canal, it being the consensus of opinion of this committee that in the fixing of said tolls American vessels should be exempted from all charges.

Resolutions adopted at the forty-second annual meeting of the National Board of Trade, Washington, D. C.

Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal, for the benefit of its own people, as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in time of war and for facilitating its domestic and foreign commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

Whereas the coastwise commerce between ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations;

Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent heretofore found impossible, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity;

Resolved, That the National Board of Trade urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted preferential tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

Resolution adopted by Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce.

Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal for the benefit of its own people as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in the time of war and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

Whereas the operation of the canal under this condition will greatly stimulate and increase American shipping:

Resolved, That the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted free passage through the Panama Canal.

Resolutions adopted by commercial bodies of the State of Washington, November 3, 1911.

Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things to provide for the national defense; to open up the shortest possible water route between the ports of the United States and between the United States and foreign countries; to prevent monopoly of means of transportation between the various sections of the Union; and to provide such transportation to the people of the United States at the lowest possible cost; to build up and expand commerce with foreign nations; and, incidentally, to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine; and

Whereas it is of the utmost importance to the State of Washington, and to all the States bordering on the Pacific Ocean, that their products—lumber, shingles, salmon, fruits, hops, wool, and other products—be most widely distributed at the least possible expense throughout the United States: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the following civic bodies of the State of Washington, viz: The New Seattle Chamber of Commerce, the Tacoma Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce, the Olympia Chamber of Commerce, the Bellingham Chamber of Commerce, the Everett Chamber of Commerce, the Port Townsend Commercial Club, the Aberdeen Chamber of Commerce, the Hoquiam Chamber of Commerce, the Bremerton Commercial Club, the Raymond Commercial Club, through their representatives in conference assembled, That there should be no tolls charged through the Panama Canal to vessels flying the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic of the United States.

Resolution adopted by directors of Industrial Association of Keokuk, Iowa.

Whereas the American people are building the Panama Canal for the good of the Nation; therefore any toll levied on American domestic commerce passing through the canal would be a direct and unjust tax to be paid by the people on every pound of freight moving, whether by water or by rail, between the east and west portions of our country.

Resolutions of Junior Order United American Mechanics.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:

Whereas England, through her foreign minister, Sir Edward Grey, has presented a second formal note of protest against the Panama Canal act exempting coastwise ships from tolls, contending that the said exemptions would not comply with the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that the canal should be open on terms of entire equality, and that the charges should be just and equitable; and

Whereas the foreign minister's note asks that the question be taken to The Hague for arbitration, and also suggests that the repeal of said American law would probably be even more expeditious; and

Whereas the said protest has created in certain quarters fresh opposition to the Panama Canal tolls law; and

Whereas the Panama Canal has been built by the United States, which owns and controls both the canal and adjacent territory; and

Whereas one of the cardinal principles of the Junor Order United American Mechanics is to bear true allegiance to the institutions, Constitution, and laws of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That while we deplore the British point of view as to the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we fervently believe and regard, far and above any treaty, the Constitution of the United States, which provides that Congress has exclusive and plenary power to regulate the interstate and foreign commerce of the United States, and that as American native-born citizens we would deem it incongruous and disastrous for the United States to agree to submit to arbitration a purely American problem to be passed upon by European judges; and be it further

Resolved, That we, members of General George A. Custer Council, No. 22, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Oakland, Cal., urge our representatives in Congress to stand faithful and fast to the ground heretofore taken in the Panama Canal act; and that copies of these resolutions be forwarded to Senators GEORGE C. PERKINS and JOHN D. WORKS, and to our Congressman JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND.

The foregoing was unanimously adopted by Custer Council, No. 22, Junior Order United American Mechanics, in regular session January 7, 1913.

Resolutions of Seattle (Wash.) Chamber of Commerce.

The trustees of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, in special session, resolved that the chamber express itself as in full accord with position taken by Hon. Philander C. Knox, Secretary of State, in his reply to protest of Great Britain against exemption of American coastwise shipping from Panama Canal tolls.

J. E. CHILBERG, President.

Resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, December 13, 1911.

Whereas the Panama Canal is being constructed by the United States Government and the people of the United States are paying the whole cost theerof, and will be obliged to pay the cost of maintenance and repairs, whether the revenues are adequate or not; and

Whereas the people of the United States have entered upon this great work chiefly for the benefit that it will be to our own commerce; and

Whereas the construction of the Panama Canal by the United States will not give to the American people the full measure of benefits they are entitled to if our commerce is compelled to pay the same tolls that other peoples are required to pay: Therefore

Resolved, That, having expended so large a sum in constructing the Panama Canal, the people of the United States are entitled to receive the fullest possible advantages therefrom; that other nations should be permitted to use the canal upon reasonable terms alike to all; that American vessels in the foreign trade should pay the same tolls as vessels of other nations, unless existing treaties would permit such American vessels to pass free; that the commerce of the United States passing between United States ports should be allowed free passage through the Panama Canal in all ships of American registry and should be regarded and regulated as coastwise commerce of the United States.

Resolved, That we petition the Government and Congress of the United States to give the most serious consideration to the enactment of laws declaring commerce between American ports passing through the Panama Canal as coastwise commerce of the United States and free of tolls, and if treaty provisions or commercial conventions which have provisions for termination by notice from either party will permit, to also consider the making of the Panama Canal free to all vessels of American registry.

Resolutions adopted by the resolutions committee of the Waterway Conference of the Southern Commercial Congress, and unanimously approved and adopted by the Southern Commercial Congress at its convention at Nashville, Tenn.

We favor the adoption of a law by Congress granting the use of the Panama Canal to American ships engaged in coastwise commerce free of toll and the prevention of the use of the canal by any steamship line owned or controlled by a railway or any monopolistic interest.

We favor such legislation as is necessary to induce the construction of a merchant marine for the United States and the carrying of American commerce in American ships under the American flag.

Resolutions passed at meeting of the Mobile (Ala.) Chamber of Commerce and Business League, held Monday, March 18, 1912.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through this canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag.

Resolution adopted by Board of Trade of Tampa, Fla.

Whereas the Government of the United States has expended nearly $700,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors and the construction of canals, and by act of Congress, passed 1884, declared as follows: "No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed"; and

Whereas the Panama Canal was built by American money, American genius, and American enterprise, and with the understanding by the American people that the canal would be operated for their benefit, primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States and for commercial benefit of the whole country; and

Whereas the imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof of American boats engaged in American commerce would in many instances prohibit the shipping of American products from coast to coast, the interchange of products of the Pacific and the Atlantic and the Gulf, therefore defeating the very ends for which the American people indorsed the tremendous project and the expenditure of nearly a half billion of American dollars in the building of the Panama Canal: Therefore be it

Resolved, That * * * preferential treatment may be accorded American vessels of commerce, or at least those engaged in the coastwise trade.

Recommendations of Railroad Commission of California in re Panama Canal bill.

After a public hearing and a careful investigation into the law and the facts, the Railroad Commission of the State of California makes the following recommendations in the matter of the Panama Canal: * * *

We recommend that American shipping engaged in coastwise trade through the canal be exempt from the payment of tolls.

We recommend that American shipping engaged in foreign trade and using the Panama Canal be likewise exempted from the payment of tolls or that subsidies equivalent in amount, at least, to those paid by other Governments to their ships using the canal be provided by the United States.

Otherwise, the United States, which built the canal at a tremendous outlay, will be the only nation whose vessels are sailing through the canal without Government assistance. We do not believe that there is anything in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to prevent such action on the part of the United States. The treaty provides that the rules of neutralization to govern the canal are to be substantially the same as those which govern the use of the Suez Canal. The vessels of Great Britain and other nations using the Suez Canal receive subsidies from their Governments, and no one has ever contended that the principle of equality in the use of the canal is thereby violated. In the same way the United States can clearly pay subsidies to her vessels using the Panama Canal, and what she can do directly by the payment of subsidies she certainly can do indirectly by the remission of tolls in the same amount.

We respectfully direct the attention of California's Representatives in Congress. * * *

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterways Association.

The policy of free waterways is fundamental with the American people, and hence this association declares that this principle should be extended to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal.

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, consisting of over 1,200 delegates, representing every State in the Union.

We submit that waterways improved or created by the Federal Government by the use of money contributed by the whole people of the United States should be free for the use of American ships in fair and open competition and on equal terms, without the payment of tolls, but we contend that a water carrier owned, controlled, or operated by a competing land carrier is unfair competition, and in order to preserve to the whole people the benefits of continued fair competition so that the beneficent influence of open waterways shall not be nullified by hostile interests, we recommend the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the commission may more effectually regulate competing land and water carriers and competing water carriers and provide for the interchange of traffic.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] yield some of his time?

Mr. LAMB. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, during the year 1912 the farm lands in every section of our glorious country have truly "blossomed as the rose." To use the language of Mr. Secretary Wilson, in his report for the year's activities, it has been the most productive of all years. Earth's greatest dividends have been yielded to us. The reward is a high general level of production. The man behind the plow has filled the Nation's larder, crammed the storehouses, and will send liberal supplies to foreign countries.

During the consideration of the supply bill for the Department of Agriculture, it seems to me right and proper that this Congress, acting for 96,000,000 of people, about one-third of whom reside on the farm, should at least devote a few hours of time in considering the farmer as our Nation's chief asset. In this connection, I call to the attention of this House some impressive figures taken from Mr. Secretary Wilson's report for the past year.

Based on the census item of wealth production on farms, the grand total for 1912 is estimated to be $9,532,000,000. Being an increase of more than twice the value of the wealth produced on farms in 1899, and about one-eighth more than the wealth produced in 1909. This is the record for some of the leading products of the farm for the year 1912:

Corn, 3,169,000,000 bushels, value $1,759,000,000; hay, 72,425,000 tons, value $861,000,000; cotton, including both lint and seed, estimated value $860,000,000; wheat, 720,333,000 bushels, estimated value $596,000,000.

Oats, 1,417,172,000 bushels, of the estimated value of $478,000,000.

Potatoes, 414,289,000 bushels, of the estimated value of $190,000,000.

Barley, 224,619,000 bushels, of the estimated value of $125,000,000.

Tobacco, 959,437,000 pounds, estimated value $97,000,000.

Flax seed, 29,755,000 bushels, estimated value $39,000,000.

Rye, 35,422,000 bushels, estimated value $24,000,000.

Rice of the estimated value of $20,000,000.

Buckwheat, 19,124,000 bushels, of the estimated value of over $12,000,000.

Hops, 44,500,000 bushels, of the estimated value of $11,000,000.

Beet sugar, cane sugar, molasses, maple sugar, etc., of the value of $117,000,000.

Dairy products, $830,000,000.

Poultry and eggs, $570,000,000.

Wool, 318,548,000 pounds, valued at $55,500,000.

Animals sold from the farm and slaughtered on the farm, 111,000,000 head, estimated farm value $1,930,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, these figures, as taken from the annual report of Mr. Secretary Wilson, are of such large proportions that the average mind can not grasp the full significance of the stupendous wealth that flows from the farm and that comes to bless our millions of people.

Truly, it would seem that we should congratulate ourselves that we are in a land of plenty—that verily flows with milk and honey.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer, being the Nation's chief asset, from whom comes the very basis of all our prosperity, has not fared so well at the hands of Congress as have those in other sections of our country and following other pursuits.

I want to say here, speaking as a man who comes from an agricultural district, and knowing how receptive the farmer is as to all matters of information that are sent to him from the Federal Government through bulletins and otherwise, I think there is no more appreciative citizen in this country of ours than the one on whom we must depend for our livelihood.

Do you know, Mr. Chairman, that as a new Member of Congress, I came here imbued with an idea gathered directly from the controlling sentiment of an agricultural community, that there ought to be economy in the administration of the affairs of the National Government; and I still adhere to that idea. In the short time that I have had the honor to serve on the Committee on Agriculture, being the only appropriation committee about which I know anything as to its practical workings, when an item has been increased here and there in the bill, I began at once to draw on the information which I had directly from the people, that we must cut down the expenses of the Government. I was slow in casting any vote that would increase an estimate or a former appropriation.

But what was my horror when I came to think of the thirty-odd millions of people constituting our agricultural class, who are the very base of the wealth and prosperity of this Nation, and to learn that the total appropriation given the Agricultural Department of this Government is less than the cost of one battleship. I say, Mr. Chairman, that in my judgment, while the expenses of the Government should be held in check, and we should not dissipate the funds that are placed in our hands as a trust fund, we should go to another truth, and that truth is to spend money wisely and where the best results can be obtained. Take the great agricultural section and see the magnificent crops that we had last year. It would be well to consider some of the means at command that brought about such wonderful results. The work in organizing the boys' and girls' corn clubs, whose memberships are receiving advanced ideas as to intensive farming and modern methods as to crop culture, and the practical application of these methods is an important movement well worthy of note. It a recent hearing before our committee, when a number of boys and girls from agricultural States were there, and in their own way made reports as to the acres they had cultivated and the methods used, it developed that on farm land that had heretofore yielded 25 to 30 bushels of corn to the acre, that by modern methods, land tilled by the average boy and girl was yielding from 100 to 212 bushels of corn to the acre. This was brought about, Mr. Chairman, by the information that goes out from the Agricultural Department, supplemented by the agricultural departments of the States of this Nation, and by local organizations where the spirit of pride has been stirred up in the breast of the young people by splendid prizes being offered for which they compete.

In the State of Texas—one of the greatest agricultural States in this Union, and I might say a State that can support the entire Nation with its agricultural wealth, if its acreage were developed—this last year $10,000 in prizes was put up by organizations of business men and others who were interested in farm development, and the yields made by the great number of people who took advantage of the opportunity presented by the contest were remarkable indeed. I believe that the United States Government, as well as the States of the Union, should promote agriculture and make every acre of land produce as much as it can produce. And whether my stay in Congress shall be long or short, my support shall always be cheerfully given to any legislation looking to a still greater development of our agricultural interests.

Mr. Chairman, one trouble with farm life is that people on the farm have not the conveniences that the city man has. The farmer has not the mail facilities that the city man has, yet he has been aided by the rural free delivery in the last few years. Many of the comforts that are enjoyed in the village and in the city are not vouchsafed to the farmer, and the farmer's boy, ambitious to do something in this world, gets discontented with his surroundings. His school opportunities frequently are limited, and yet we are building up along that line. And by reason of his surroundings the farmer's boy yearns to get into a more active sphere of life.

We can not blame him for that. But this Congress, if it acts wisely, will look to the condition of the farmer boy and make his conveniences and his surroundings such as that he will have a love for the old farm that gave him birth, and such as that he will have a desire to see that the acreage that has now dwindled down, where the briers have come in here and there, so that the farm is not as large as it once was, shall be redeemed and enlarged so that it will be made to yield what it can yield under modern improvements and modern methods. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, while this report that I make of last year's great earning power and the great wealth that has been turned loose from the soil would indicate that the farmers in every section of our country are indeed prosperous, I want to say to you that, while this great wealth has been yielded up, the farmers, as a matter of fact, are not as prosperous as the figures would indicate.

What is the trouble? One of the great difficulties that confront us as an agricultural people is the fact that the farmer does not get the price for his products that he ought to have in the markets of the world. He goes forth in the springtime; he bets his time and his energy and his ability against the seasons and the insects. He plants in faith, he cultivates in hope, and he reaps in grace. If he wins out with a great crop, it frequently happens that that crop brings in the markets of the world a less price than a crop half of that amount would bring. There is no reason for that except our modern system of marketing. I want to say that in a country as big as this, with 96,000,000 people to be fed, it is only fair to the man on the farm that he should receive 100 cents on the dollar for everything that he produces on that farm. [Applause.]

Does he get it? The figures will show, Mr. Chairman, that of the products of the farm, taking the markets for these products as a whole, where the products have gone out to the ultimate consumer, and when you trace them back to the farmer you find he gets only 46 per cent of what the consumer has had to pay for those products. I declare to this Congress that that kind of system is wrong. It is enough to discourage the farmer. It is enough to drive the boys from the farm into other walks of life, and it is so driving them as the days go by.

Mr. Chairman, in July, 1910, I noticed in an article published by Mr. B. F. Yoakum, known this country over, some figures on this subject that, were it not for the conservative source whence they came, might seem to be highly exaggerated. Among other things, Mr. Yoakum states in the article referred to: "After a careful investigation it is estimated that during the year (1909) the farmers received and the consumers of the city of New York paid for the following articles of food approximately the amounts respectively shown:

Article.	Paid to farmer.	Paid by consumer.
Eggs	$17,238,000	$28,730,000
Cabbage	1,825,000	9,125,000
Onions	821,000	8,212,000
Milk	22,912,000	48,880,000
Potatoes	8,437,000	60,000,000

Where is that exorbitant waste? Any system of marketing that would deny to the farmer a participation in the profits from the products he grows in this tremendous amount that is paid by the consumer, that system is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. I yield to the gentleman from Texas 5 minutes more.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I beg to call attention to certain figures and statements recently made by Mr. Yoakum, and editorial comment thereon by the Washington Post, and commend same to the best thought of the membership of this House. I read:

A NATIONAL MARKET BUREAU.

In a letter to Senator HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, B. F. Yoakum, of the Frisco Railway system, has presented some facts and statistics that point the way to the solution of the problem of reducing the high cost of living, at least in part. Mr. Yoakum's plan vitalizes the parcel post and supplies the one thing necessary to make it an effective medium.

On the basis of a $9,000,000,000 crop, of which it is estimated that one-third remains on the farm, Mr. Yoakum gives figures which fairly represent the distribution of the profits. He points out that if the crop is worth $9,000,000,000 and one-third remains on the farm, $6,000,000,000 worth of products are actually sold by the farmer, the consumers paying $13,000,000,000, or more than twice as much as the farmer receives.

Using the estimate of the Department of Agriculture that farmers receive only 46 per cent of what the consumers pay, Mr. Yoakum asserts that the distribution of profits and expenses is about as follows:

"Received by the producers, $6,000,000,000, or 46.1 per cent.

"Allowing for a reasonable expense of selling and dealers' and retailers' profits, $4,945,000,000, or 38.1 per cent.

"Waste under existing methods, $1,560,000,000, or 12 per cent.

"Received by the railroads, $495,000,000, or 3.8 per cent.

"Total, $13,000,000,000."

It is true, as Mr. Yoakum says, that up to the present time the Government has done nothing in a practical way to aid in reducing the cost of distribution, although, conservatively estimated, there is an annual loss of about $1,500,000,000, which could be divided between the consumers and the producers.

The remedy suggested by the railroad man is a national market bureau under the Department of Agriculture, with an annual appropriation of $500,000 for the establishment of a system of market reports, cutting out unnecessary expenses between the producer and the consumer and cooperating with agricultural organizations. The bureau of markets should have offices in different agricultural States, where, through associations of agricultural bodies, market prices could be furnished to the farmers of the different localities daily during their respective shipping seasons.

The best part of Mr. Yoakum's plan is that it would enable farmers and consumers to take full advantage of the parcel post, each class being aware of the prices that should prevail. The ultimate outcome would be the elimination of the middlemen. The reason why the consumer pays so much now is because farm products pass through so many hands, each grasping for profit, before the stuff reaches the consumer.

That is a part of the record that he submits, and other men of equal authority with Mr. Yoakum give like figures.

This leads me to this thought, Mr. Chairman. In this system that prevails there is a rotten waste somewhere, and it is the duty of this Government to help our farmers who are scattered through every State in the Union to find where this waste lies, and by educational methods help to avoid that waste.

There are in many cases too great freight charges; in many cases there are 5 middlemen between the farmer and the ultimate consumer. In the case of fruit, berries, and truck that are perishable, too frequently the case, the charges of railroad, icing, and express in transporting shipments from the farm to the markets are greater than proceeds of sale, and the farmer is drawn on to pay for the loss of the shipments, instead of getting a profit. How can you expect the farmer to have the courage to plant the same crop the succeeding year?

How long can we ask the boy to farm in conditions like these?

This bill, Mr. Chairman, reaches out in a limited way and provides $50,000 for a division of markets in the Department of Agriculture that information be obtained and disseminated that will lead to remedying the present market conditions. The farmer will be benefited in that he will get a better price for his product, and the consumer will be benefited in that he is put in closer touch with the producer.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this Congress has not hesitated to vote $40,000,000 for river and harbor improvements to carry the commerce of the world, that commerce being, in the main, the crops that come from the farms; we had better begin at the other end of the line and create that commerce by making the boys love the farm. [Applause.]

We can take it, Mr. Chairman, in all walks of life, the farmer is the backbone of our country. While you may have isms and schisms in politics in the congested centers, wild theories which if adopted would destroy our institutions, the great conservative force on the farm, the farmer living close to nature, and nature's God, has saved the Government in the past and will continue to save it in the future. He bears the burdens of tax in time of peace and answers to the call of Old Glory in time of war, and I ask in his name that this measure, carrying $50,000 for the initial expense for a division of markets, may be enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEALL of Texas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1913.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA (H. DOC. NO. 1346).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In accordance with the provisions of section 18 of an act of Congress (Public, No. 334) approved August 24, 1912, I appointed a commission—to conduct an examination into the transportation question in the Territory of Alaska; to examine railroad routes from the seaboard to the coal fields and to the interior and navigable waterways; to secure surveys and other information with respect to railroads, including cost of construction and operation; to obtain information in respect to the coal fields and their proximity to railroad routes; and to make report of the facts to Congress on or before the 1st day of December, 1912, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, together with their conclusions and recommendations in respect to the best and most available routes for railroads in Alaska which will develop the country and the resources thereof for the use of the people of the United States.

Under the requirements of the act, this commission consisted of—an officer of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, a geologist in charge of Alaska surveys, an officer in the Engineer Corps of the United States Navy, and a civil engineer who has had practical experience in railroad construction and has not been connected with any railroad enterprise in said Territory.

The date when the act was passed was late in the summer season, thus allowing a very limited time for the preparation of a report for presentation at the present session of Congress. Nevertheless, within a week after the act was approved the commission had been appointed, as follows:

Maj. Jay J. Morrow, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, chairman.

Alfred H. Brooks, geologist in charge of Division of Alaskan Mineral Resources, Geological Survey, vice chairman.

Civil Engineer Leonard M. Cox, United States Navy.

Colin M. Ingersoll, consulting railroad engineer, New York City.

This commission has transmitted to me a report, which is herewith submitted to Congress in accordance with the provisions of the act. An examination of this report discloses that the following are among the more important of the findings of the commission:

The Territory of Alaska contains large undeveloped mineral resources, extensive tracts of agricultural and grazing lands, and the climate of a large part of the Territory is favorable to permanent settlement and industrial development. The report contains much specific information and many interesting details with regard to these resources. It finds that they can be developed and utilized only by the construction of railways which shall connect tidewater on the Pacific Ocean with the two great inland waterways, the Yukon and the Kuskokwim Rivers. The resources of the inland region and especially of these great river basins are almost undeveloped because of lack of transportation facilities. The Yukon and Kuskokwim Rivers system include some 5,000 miles of navigable water, but these are open to commerce only about three months in the year. Moreover, the mouths of these two rivers on Bering Sea lie some 2,500 miles from Puget Sound, thus involving a long and circuitous route from the Pacific Coast States. The transportation of freight to the mouths of these rivers and thence upstream will always be so expensive and confined to so limited a season as to forbid any large industrial advancement for the great inland region now entirely dependent on these circuitous avenues of approach.

From these considerations the commission finds that railway connections with open ports on the Pacific are not only justified, but imperative if the fertile regions of inland Alaska and its mineral resources are to be utilized; but that with such railway connections a large region will be opened up to the homesteader, the prospector, and the miner. So far as the limited time available has permitted the commission has investigated, and in its report describes all of the railway routes which have been suggested for reaching the interior, including the ocean terminals of these routes. The relative advantages and disadvantages of these routes are compared. The principal result of this comparison may be stated to be that railroad development in Alaska should proceed first by means of two independent railroad systems, hereafter to be connected and supplemented as may be justified by future development. One of these lines should connect the valley of the Yukon and its tributary, the Tanana, with tidewater; and the other should be devoted to the development and needs of the Kuskokwim and the Susitna.

The best available route for the first railway system is that which leads from Cordova by way of Chitina to Fairbanks; and the best available route for the second is that which leads from Seward around Cook Inlet to the Iditarod. The first should be connected with the Bering coal field and the second with the Matanuska coal field. Other routes and terminals are discussed, but are found not to have the importance or availability for the development of the Territory possessed by the two mentioned. Thus, the route extending inland from Haines, in southeastern Alaska, has value for local development, though chiefly on the Canadian side of the boundary, but the distance to Fairbanks is found to be too great to permit of its being used as a trunk line to the Yukon waters. The route from Iliamna Bay also has value for local use, but is too far to the southwest to permit of its use as a trunk line into the interior. The proposed terminals at Katalla and Controller Bay are found to be very expensive both as to construction and maintenance, besides furnishing very inferior harbors. The route inland from Valdez is at a disadvantage because it would not serve any of the coal fields, although as hereafter noted Valdez is regarded by the commission as an important alternative terminal in the possible future development of the Chitina-Fairbanks route.

The investigations of the commission indicate that the route from Cordova by way of Chitina to Fairbanks would furnish the best trunk line to the Yukon and Tanana waters: (1) Because Cordova has distinct advantages as a harbor; (2) because this route requires the shortest actual amount of construction, but chiefly (3) because the better grades possible on this route should give the lowest freight rates into the Tanana Valley. The Copper River & Northwestern Railroad is now constructed from Cordova to Chitina and thence up the Chitina River. The commission recommends the building of a railway from Chitina to Fairbanks, 313 miles, estimated to cost $13,971,000, with the provision that if this railway is built by other interests than those controlling the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad, and if an equitable traffic arrangement can not be made with it, connection should be made with Valdez by the Thompson Pass route, 101 miles, estimated to cost $6,101,479.

The commission finds that Cordova offers the best present ocean terminal for the Bering River coal. The commission also points out that it would not be economical to haul the Matanuska coal to either Valdez or Cordova, and that therefore the logical outlet for that field is Seward. If commercial development of these two fields should disclose that the quality of the coal is the same in both, the Bering River field would have the advantage of greater proximity to open tidewater. A branch line from the Copper River Railway to the Bering River field, a distance of 38 miles, at an estimated cost of $2,054,000, is recommended to afford an outlet for the coal on Prince William Sound and into the Copper River Valley and the region where there is at present the largest market for Alaska coal.

The commission finds that a railway from Chitina to Fairbanks will not solve the transportation problem of Alaska, because it will not give access to the Matanuska coal field, the fertile lands and mineral wealth of the lower Susitna, or the great Kuskokwim basin. This province properly belongs to an independent railway system based on the harbor at Seward. The commission recommends a railway from Kern Creek, the present inland terminal of the Alaska Northern Railway, to the Susitna River (distance, 115 miles; estimated cost, $5,209,000), with a branch line to the Matanuska coal field (distance, 38 miles; estimated cost, $1,618,000), and an extension of the main line through the Alaska Range to the Kuskokwim River (distance, 229 miles; estimated cost, $12,760,000).

The entire railways thus recommended will constitute two independent systems involving 733 miles of new construction at a cost of $35,000,000. Eventually these systems will be tied together and there will be earlier demands for branch and local lines as the country develops. One of these systems will find an outlet to the coast over the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad; the other over the Alaska Northern. If these new lines are constructed by others than those financially interested in these two railroads respectively, satisfactory traffic arrangements would have to be made with them. If the new railways recommended should be constructed by the Government, the question is necessarily presented as to whether the Government should acquire the whole or any part of the existing lines, or either of them, or should endeavor to make appropriate traffic agreements. Much would depend upon whether the Government would operate its own railroads or would make operating agreements with those operating existing lines. The commission has not discussed these questions for the reason pointed out in its report that the act of Congress omits questions of this sort from those upon which the commission was instructed to report.

The report of the commission contains the following statement:

> Its instructions from Congress do not contemplate that any recommendation should be made as to how railroads in Alaska should be constructed, i. e., by private corporate ownership or by one of the many forms in use whereby Government assistance is rendered. The commission disavows any intention of making such recommendations, believing that Congress, in its wisdom, desired to reserve to itself the solution of that problem; but it has been impossible to form any estimates of costs of operation without some assumption as to the interest rate on the capital required for construction. This interest rate would obviously differ in two cases—construction by Government or bond guaranty, and construction by private capital. Moreover, were construction carried on by private capital unassisted, the necessity of earning sufficient income to pay operating expenses and interest on bonded indebtedness might make it the duty of the directors of the corporation to impose rates on traffic that would seriously retard the development which the Territory so greatly needs.
> The commission has therefore been forced to base its studies upon two hypotheses, viz: That the capital necessary for construction is obtained at 6 per cent interest, assumed as possible if construction is carried out by private corporate ownership unassisted; and that capital is obtained at 3 per cent interest, assumed as possible if the construction is done either by the Government itself or by private capital with bonded indebtedness guaranteed both as to principal and interest.

On similar grounds the commission did not feel justified in discussing the use of the Panama Canal machinery and equipment or in including in its estimates the effect of such use; but a list of the machinery and equipment available at Panama is given in an appendix.

Upon the assumption that the railroad from Chitina to Fairbanks is built by private capital, eliminating promotion profit, but assuming the necessity of earning 6 per cent on the capital invested, it is the judgment of the commission that on estimated available traffic the road could be operated from Cordova to Fairbanks without loss at a passenger rate of 7 cents per mile and an average freight rate of 8 cents per ton-mile. This would mean a through freight rate of $36.94 per ton from Cordova to Fairbanks and a through passenger rate of $31.15. It is the opinion of the commission that—> an average freight rate exceeding 5 cents per ton-mile and passenger rate in excess of 6 cents per mile would defeat the immediate object of the railroad, namely, the expeditious development of the interior of Alaska, and, furthermore, would introduce the question as to whether or not the Seattle-Cordova-Fairbanks freight route would be able to compete with the present all-water route via the Yukon River system, except on shipments in which the time element is of such importance as to warrant the payment of a higher freight rate.

To meet the requirements of expeditious development and water competition the estimate of the commission involves a through freight rate from Cordova to Fairbanks at $22.25 per ton, and a through passenger rate of $26.70. The report further says:

> Were the road to be constructed by the Government, or by private corporate ownership with a Government guaranty of principal and interest on bonded indebtedness, the capital required should be obtained at a much lower rate of interest, thus materially reducing the annual expenditures.

Using 3 per cent on the investment as fixed charges, and omitting mileage tax of $100, on the assumption that this tax would not be levied in the case of a Government owned or aided road, the commission estimates that the road would pay on the basis of a passenger rate of 6 cents per mile and a freight rate of 5.49 cents per ton-mile, making the average through freight rate from Cordova to Fairbanks $24.43 per ton and the through passenger rate $26.70. I give these figures as illustrations. The report contains similar estimates of freight and passenger rates and traffic for the road recommended from Seward to the Kuskokwim.

After recommending the construction of the two principal systems and their extensions already mentioned, the commission states in conclusion that it—is unanimously of the opinion that this development should be undertaken at once, and prosecuted with vigor; that it can not be accomplished without providing the railroads herein recommended under some system which will insure low transportation charges and the consequent rapid settlement of this new land and the utilization of its great resources.

The necessary inference from the entire report is that in the judgment of the commission its recommendations can certainly be carried out only if the Government builds or guarantees the construction cost of the railroads recommended. If the Government is to guarantee the principal and interest of the construction bonds, it seems clear that it should own the roads, the cost of which it really pays. This is true whether the Government itself should operate the roads or should provide for their operation by lease or operating agreement. I am very much opposed to Government operation, but I believe that Government ownership with private operation under lease is the proper solution of the difficulties here presented.

I urge the prompt and earnest consideration of this report and its recommendations.

Senate joint resolution 11.

Memorial to Congress for construction and appropriation to build levees.

Whereas the Ohio River is a waterway under the control of the Federal Government; and
Whereas the Congress of the United States makes large appropriations for the improvement of said waterway; and
Whereas the cities, towns, and villages along said waterway are yearly ravaged by the floods; and
Whereas there is a very large loss of property and life by reason of the annual floods; and
Whereas much sickness and disease follow in the wake of these overflows; and
Whereas it is feasible and practicable in nearly every case to protect by means of levees, embankments, or flood walls the cities, towns, and villages from the annual overflows and from the destruction of property; and
Whereas the prevailing conditions along the Ohio River necessitates a system of flood defenses: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of the Eightieth General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we urge upon Congress of the United States the necessity of the early examination into the feasibility and practicability of the construction of the proper levees, embankments, or flood walls for the protection of the cities, towns, and villages, and that we also urge Congress to make the appropriations for such surveys and examinations. Be it further Resolved, That the secretary of the state of Ohio is hereby instructed to forthwith transmit certified copies of this resolution to all Ohio Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of Congress of the United States and the Clerks of these respective bodies at Washington, D. C.

C. L. SWAIN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

OLD EXCHANGE BUILDING, CHARLESTON, S. C.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 8369) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give to the Order of Daughters of American Revolution the "Old Exchange" building in the city of Charleston, S. C. I call the attention of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the report (S. Rept. 1199).

Mr. TILLMAN. This is a local matter in which our people are deeply concerned, and I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to convey, by quitclaim deed, the building formerly used for post-office purposes and now known as the "Old Exchange," in the city of Charleston, S. C., to the Order of Daughters of the American Revolution in and of the State of South Carolina, to be held by it as a historical memorial in trust for such use, care, and occupation thereof by the Rebecca Motte Chapter of that order, resident in the city of Charleston, State aforesaid, as the chapter shall in its judgment deem to best subserve the preservation of the colonial building and promote the honorable and patriotic purpose for which the grant is requested.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Whereas during the revolutionary uprising headed by Gen. Louis Mena, which occurred on July 30, 1912, in the Republic of Nicaragua, the armed forces of the United States were landed in Nicaraguan territory; and

Whereas said armed forces of the United States did actually occupy Nicaraguan territory and participate in an armed conflict with the revolutionary forces therein, in which several of the American marines lost their lives; and

Whereas said armed forces of the United States have continued to occupy Nicaraguan territory, exercising military authority thereover, and without the authority of Congress: Therefore

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate such statement of facts and details regarding said occupation and military activity, specifically setting forth the causes which brought about such forcible occupation of the territory of a friendly nation and armed combat with its citizens; and further

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether American marines were placed in possession of the Government buildings or residence of the President of Nicaragua and have continued to occupy such buildings since said revolutionary uprising.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On yesterday I introduced a bill (S. 8398) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 8398) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the Panama Canal act approved August 24, 1912, be, and it is hereby, amended by inserting, after the words "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," the words "or upon vessels belonging to the United States. The tolls shall not exceed in the aggregate an amount sufficient to pay the United States the cost of operation, maintenance, protection, and a fair interest upon its expenditure in the construction of the canal, after deducting therefrom an amount equal to the tolls which, but for the foregoing provision, would be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States and vessels belonging to the United States. For the purpose of making such deduction an account shall be kept of the tonnage of such vessels passing through the canal."

Mr. NEWLANDS. On yesterday I introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 159) regarding the Panama Canal tolls, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 159) regarding the Panama Canal tolls.

Resolved, etc., That in providing in the recent act for the opening of the Panama Canal, approved August 24, 1912, that "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," it was the purpose of Congress to subject the Panama Canal in its purely domestic relations, like all our domestic rivers, canals, and waterways, to the traditional policy of freedom from the imposition of tolls upon vessels engaged in domestic and coastwise transportation for expenditures made by the Government of the United States in their operation, maintenance, improvement, or construction, and that it was not the purpose of the Government of the United States to impose upon foreign and international tonnage any portion of the cost of operation, maintenance, and interest upon the expenditures of the United States which would be properly assignable to the tonnage of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

SEC. 2. That in the opinion of Congress the tolls fixed by the President for the passage of vessels engaged in foreign and international trade through the Panama Canal will not for many years yield such proportion of such cost of operation, maintenance, and interest as would be properly chargeable upon vessels passing through the canal engaged in foreign or international trade were such tolls levied upon all vessels passing through the canal, including those engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and therefore such tolls are reasonable and proportionate, and furnish no just ground of complaint to foreign countries.

SEC. 3. That in order to clear up any misapprehension upon this subject and to give assurance of the future, Congress hereby declares the intention of the Government of the United States to fix such tolls for the use of the Panama Canal as will pay to the United States only the cost of operation, maintenance, protection, and a fair interest upon its investment, and that the tolls to be charged against vessels passing through the canal engaged in foreign or international trade shall not exceed in the aggregate such proportion of such cost of operation, maintenance, protection, and interest as the tonnage of such vessels bears to the total tonnage of all vessels passing through the Panama Canal.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22871) to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and acts supplementary thereto, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. PAGE, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I desire to say, in reference to the appointment of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill, that my own strong preference was not to serve upon the conference; other Senators who might have been named by reason of priority of rank on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry were of the same mind, and all are agreed upon the conferees named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conferees named were suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], and his explanation accounts for their appointment by the Chair.

WATER SUPPLY IN COLORADO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (H. The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. GAMBLE, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. OWEN conferees on the part of the Senate.

SAMUEL SCHIFFER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8861) for the relief of the legal representatives of Samuel Schiffer, with an amendment, on page 2, line 8, of the Senate amendment, after "notwithstanding," to insert:

Provided, however, That in no event shall the judgment rendered in said cause, if any, exceed the sum of $62,150.34, and the amount of such judgment, if any, when paid to the claimants, shall be received by them in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims.

The motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY IN YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3130) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Conrad-Stanford Co. to use certain lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I observe that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] has given notice that he desires to address the Senate immediately after the conclusion of the routine business this morning. I am quite sure that this bill will lead to a lengthy debate, and I therefore object to its present consideration.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say that I have no desire whatever to interfere with the Senator from Kentucky. I had, of course, supposed that probably this bill would be considered and voted on in half or three-quarters of an hour——

Mr. SMOOT. It will take a longer time than that, I am quite sure.

Mr. MYERS. But if there is any danger of interfering with the right of the Senator from Kentucky, I shall not now press the bill.

ANTIINJUNCTION LEGISLATION.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, on or about the 15th of May, 1912, the House of Representatives passed House bill No. 23635, ordinarily spoken of as the Clayton anti-injunction bill. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate at that time. The committee have proceeded to have some hearings on the bill. On the 1st day of June last I inquired of the chairman of the committee when a report might be expected. While the assurances of the chairman were not very tangible, I did not at that time offer a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill, but I did give notice that unless the committee reported that bill to the Senate for its consideration, I would, after a reasonable delay to enable the committee to give full consideration to the bill and to report it, ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] a little later—I think it was on the 12th day of June—made a similar inquiry and received similar latitudinarian suggestions as to the purpose of the committee to not unduly delay a report on the bill; and the matter has continued from that time until this time.

I think, Mr. President, the time has come when it is due to the Senate that the committee should report that bill, so that the Senate may consider it and vote on it; and, unless the chairman of the committee can give me to-day some tangible assurances that we are to have a report and an opportunity to vote on the bill I shall submit a motion to discharge the committee from its further consideration. I ask the chairman of the committee what the Senate may expect in this respect?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I am unable to state what the Senate may expect or does expect, because I am not in the confidence of the expectations of individual Members of the Senate. I will say to the Senator from Virginia, however, that in this particular matter, at least, the Committee on the Judiciary has not been dilatory in the performance of its duty. Whatever delay has occurred in this matter has been delay caused by the friends of the bill, who have sought hearings and have not then appeared. Less than two weeks ago those who were most interested in the bill appeared before the subcommittee and had a considerable hearing. To-morrow is set for a hearing by the subcommittee on the bill.

I have no desire, as chairman of the committee or otherwise, to prevent the Senate from taking any action it pleases. If the Senate chooses to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill, I am sure neither the chairman nor any member of the committee will feel in the slightest degree irritated. But I want to assure the Senator that this bill and its companion bill have been receiving due, full, and prompt consideration, and whatever delay has occurred has been largely caused by the failure of the friends of the bill to appear at the times set for hearings at their request. Of course I can give the Senate no assurance as to when the action of the committee may be expected or what it may be.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator starts out by manifesting a little irritability because a very pertinent inquiry is made of him about a bill submitted to a committee of which he is chairman, and disclaiming any knowledge as to what the Senate expects in the matter. I can tell him that I, as one Senator, expect the committee to report that bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator desires the committee to report this bill before it has had the consideration which the friends of the bill themselves insist upon, the Senator knows very well, under the rules, the course which he is at liberty to pursue. I assure the Senator again, as I assured him before, that the chairman of the committee and the subcommittee that has this matter in charge have been working with diligence upon the bill, and have not delayed it with the desire in any respect to prevent the Senate from taking action upon the bill but in order that it might be thoroughly considered, and in view of the repeated requests made for hearings and consideration by those who are friendly to the bill.

I make that statement to the Senator in all good faith, and I hope the Senator will so accept it. At the same time, as chairman of the committee, I do not want to hinder the Senator. I do not want to plead delay. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am individually concerned, that the Senate shall take up this matter at once, through the discharge of the committee, if the Senate believes such action is the best for the expedition of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I do not think there is anything involved in this bill that requires such protracted hearings. The matters involved in the bill may be considered and acted upon by the Senate without any great array of testimony one way or the other in respect to them. We all know that the committee has the power to bring these hearings to a conclusion. We all know that the committee can require the appearance of those who desire to be heard, and if they do not appear they ought to be cut off from a hearing. We all know that this matter of hearings is a much-resorted-to method of indefinitely postponing measures that ought to be considered in Congress.

I should like to know from the chairman of the committee who it is that desires this hearing which he says will come up in a few days.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the bill was referred to a subcommittee of which the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is chairman. I am a member of that subcommittee. The bill came over to the Senate at the close of last session. We had not time to investigate it then. It effects a complete revolution in the law of preliminary injunctions and temporary restraining orders, and also in respect to final injunctions.

The bill went over until this session. We have had several hearings on it. Most of the hearings, I think, have been at the instance of the friends of the bill. I recall very well that Mr. Gompers occupied nearly all the time at two of our hearings.

The Senator from New York is not here. We are to have another hearing to-morrow, when we expect to dispose of the bill, as far as the subcommittee is concerned, and we expect to make some report to the full committee at the next session. This is all I can tell the Senator about it.

The measure is a very important one. As I said, it involves a complete change and an entire revolution in our law relating to what we call temporary restraining orders, preliminary injunctions, and final injunctions. It is a very important matter, because it is so far-reaching in its consequences, and the subcommittee, for which I am speaking, have felt that they ought to give the matter full consideration.

I want further to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that recently the Supreme Court of the United States has issued a new set of equity rules, covering, among other things, this matter of temporary restraining orders, preliminary injunctions, and final injunctions. Those rules, as I say, are new, and we are considering them in connection with this bill, to see whether or not any legislation is required in addition to what is proposed by the new equity rules of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I believe the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is a member of the subcommittee with me, and he can speak for himself. I am in the attitude of the Senator from Wyoming; I am speaking only for myself, personally.

I want to add just one word. There is no disposition to delay the matter; but, owing to the great importance of the subject and the character of it, we have felt that we ought not to handle it in a sort of "whangdoodle" manner and throw it before the Senate in a reckless manner and go into it roughshod, as though we were passing an ordinary bill to pension John Jones.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it seems to me time enough has elapsed since the 15th day of last May to enable the committee to handle this matter without handling it—I do not know that I got the word exactly right—in a "whangdoodle" manner. I do not know exactly what the Senator means by a "whangdoodle" manner, but I think the committee ought to handle it in some way. I do not dispute the importance of the bill. The rules adopted by the Supreme Court are simply rules of procedure, and very helpful rules on the general line of the purposes of this bill, but they do not go to the root of the evil aimed at in the bill. I think the bill has had very large consideration already.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Virginia says the rules of the Supreme Court do not go to the root of the evil. In what respect does the Senator think the pending bill improves the situation over that provided for by the rules of the Supreme Court?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have not the slightest idea of going into a discussion of the merits of this bill with the Senator from Utah on a preliminary motion like this. It seems to me the disposition to filibuster on that side of the Chamber has gotten out of reasonable limits. The Senator, I am afraid, wants to filibuster against the consideration of this bill. He can not draw me into any such attitude as that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator seems to think the rules of the Supreme Court are not sufficient to cover the evil. I have been giving somewhat diligent attention to this whole question, and I should be glad to hear from the Senator from Virginia in what particular he thinks the rules of the Supreme Court do not cover the evil.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. At the proper time, Mr. President, I expect to say something in respect to that matter. But we all know that the Senator from Utah, an able lawyer and a very conservative, if not an ultraconservative Senator in respect to matters of this sort, does not look with very much favor upon this anti-injunction bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has said that he intended to move to discharge the committee in order that the Senate itself might consider this question. Certainly before he proposes a radical motion of that kind he ought to be able to tell the Senate why he does it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do it because the committee has delayed unreasonably its report on a very important bill. I gave that reason once; but I certainly am not called upon to go into a discussion of the merits of a bill when I move to discharge a committee from its consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Minnesota has suggested that in all probability the rules recently adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States cover the situation. As I understand, the Senator from Virginia denies that, and I should be glad to have the Senator from Virginia tell us why he denies it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I say, I will not delay these proceedings and engage in a filibustering process to prevent a hearing of the matter which I am trying to get before the Senate by responding to any such invitation as that.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. NELSON. There is one thing, Mr. President, that would tempt me to make rapid progress on this injunction bill, if it would have the effect of checking the other side of the Chamber from preventing the confirmation of nominations.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am very sorry the Senator from Minnesota wants to cooperate with this side of the Chamber to prevent the confirmation of nominations. This side of the Chamber expects to give due consideration to nominations at the proper time and at the proper place, and to dispose of them as it thinks will best promote the welfare of the country. But that is no part or parcel of a discussion of this motion—this suggestion of a discharge of the committee because of its exceeding great delay in reporting a matter of very great public concern.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I thought the Senator from Wyoming wished to say something; but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I merely wish to inquire how long the committee has had this bill under consideration.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Since the 15th day of last May.

Mr. OWEN. And the extreme haste of the committee is now described as "whangdoodle" haste?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understood the Senator from Minnesota to say he objected to proceeding with any "whangdoodle" haste in the matter. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is an authority on phrases, is not here; and I do not know what the meaning of this phrase "whangdoodle haste" is. But it looks to me as if there has been "whangdoodle" delay, and no haste of any sort whatever, when the bill has been held since the 15th day of last May, and we appear to be as far from a report now as we were then.

This bill has had careful consideration in the House of Representatives, Mr. President. It has had the consideration of one of the great political parties of this country. I think the time has come when the Members of the Senate ought to go on record with respect to it. If they are opposed to the bill, let them give their reasons for it, and record their votes. But I am not going to rest content to see the bill smothered in committee.

This matter of hearings may go on forever. I do not care whether the hearings are being given to so-called friends of the bill or to the opponents of the bill; but what I do insist upon is that the committee shall bring their hearings to an end and that they shall report the bill to the Senate. As I understand, the Senator from Minnesota says that the subcommittee will complete their investigations and reach their conclusions to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. I meant to say that I hope so. The chairman of the subcommittee is absent, but a meeting is called for to-morrow, and I suppose we will be able to close it then.

There is one thing I want to say to the Senator from Virginia in all Christian spirit, and that is that I think this is a question that we never ought to consider from a party standpoint. It is not a question whether the Democratic Party favors it or whether the Republican Party favors it. It is too big and too broad a question to be a mere naked party question. We ought to consider it divorced from all party considerations, if any question at all is to be considered in that form in this Chamber.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I had not the slightest purpose of making it a political question. But I did say, and I repeat, that the great public importance of this bill and the demand for its prompt consideration are made manifest by the fact that it has been considered in the House of Representatives and has passed that body, and that it has been considered in the national convention of one of the great political parties of this country and has been approved in that convention. I refer to those things not for the purpose of making it a political question, but for the purpose of emphasizing the importance to the country at large, to people of all political parties, that this bill should be reported and should be passed upon by the Senate. If the Members of the Senate do not think the bill ought to be passed, let them say so by a vote recorded in their Journal. If they think the bill ought to be passed, let it be passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Let us have the Senate say so. Suppose the Senator from Virginia make his motion to have a vote upon this matter.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Idaho is showing a very commendable zeal in facilitating this matter. I desired to secure some information about it and to proceed fairly and justly and considerately. As the Senator from Minnesota indicated that perhaps after to-morrow we would have a report, I felt indisposed to insist upon a vote. But I do enter the motion, Mr. President, to discharge the committee from the further consideration of this bill. Such a motion can be carried over for a day by any Senator, and I therefore do not expect to ask a vote on it to-day. But I desire to enter the motion and to say that I shall call it up within the next few days, giving an opportunity for this report to come in which the Senator from Minnesota says may possibly come after to-morrow. If it does not come in two or three days, I shall ask for a vote on my motion.

I enter the motion, and ask that it may lie on the table; and I give notice to the Senate that in a very few days, unless a report is forthcoming, I shall ask a vote of the Senate on that motion.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator has entered that motion?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, under the rule it goes over, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I knew there would be objection. I am perfectly willing to have a vote on it now, but I knew it would be carried over.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts said the motion went over under the rule. It does not go over unless it is objected to. Who objects?

Mr. LODGE. I asked that it go over, in the absence of the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that there is now a motion pending to that effect.

Mr. LODGE. When I said it went over under the rule, I meant it to go over under the rule, of course.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not understand the Senator, and I wanted to know who objected.

Mr. LODGE. I objected to its being considered to-day, in the absence of the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well; that is satisfactory.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that my motion may be entered and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. BORAH. I gave notice yesterday that I would ask the Senate to-day to consider the bill (H. R. 22913) to create a department of labor, but in view of the fact that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] desires to address the Senate, and also the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], I will say that I will attempt to have this bill considered as soon as those Senators shall have concluded their remarks.

SUSPENSION OF STATE STATUTES BY INJUNCTION.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, because it is apropos to the discussion which has just occurred, but not with any desire whatever to create any impression that the Committee on the Judiciary has not been doing its full duty in the matter, I desire to call attention to the situation with reference to another pending bill, not so sweeping in its character but nevertheless a bill of very great importance, relating to temporary injunctions issued by Federal courts against the enforcement of statutes enacted by a State, and against the enforcement of orders promulgated by administrative boards of a State.

Last summer, when the bill was pending which made the annual appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, an amendment was offered to that bill by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] relating to injunctions issued against the Interstate Commerce Commission, and an amendment was offered by me relating to these injunctions against State administrative boards. There was some discussion here, and the amendments were incorporated into that bill and it passed the Senate.

The bill, it will be remembered, was vetoed because of the proposal to repeal the provision for the Court of Commerce. It came back into Congress as a new bill, containing exactly the same amendments, and a second time the bill was passed by both branches of Congress and met with the veto of the President. In the closing days of the session the necessity for passing a supply bill and keeping it strictly within the limits of that purpose made it necessary to drop the suggested amendments.

I introduced a bill some time ago in the present session providing for the same purpose, and I hope that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary will give it early consideration.

I wish to say in this connection, Mr. President, that in my State the use of the power of issuing preliminary injunctions without notice has been scandalously abused by the Federal court. It was one of the subjects dealt with in the annual message of our governor this year and covered several pages. Laws passed the legislature giving the commission the power to fix maximum rates on intrastate business, and they promulgated orders under it, and before papers could be presented to the State courts in the matter, within 15 minutes after the act passed the legislature and met the approval of the governor, by wire a temporary restraining order was made on certain officers of the State to prevent their entering into the execution of these solemn statutes of the State.

I say to Senators, if the present Congress refuses to consider a situation of that kind, you will simply leave it to the Congress that follows to consider it, because whether it is a political question or not I do not believe an American Congress is going to permit a situation of that kind to exist very long, where these inferior Federal courts by telegraph, within 15 minutes after a solemn State statute is enacted, tie up the officers of a State. That was done over two years ago with reference to passenger rates in my State. That proceeding is dragging its slow length along before a referee, and it will be years before the people of the State can have a final judgment on it.

The proceeding has been one of abuse, and you are surprised at this irritation which exists in these States. We have some timber in the Black Hills in the western part of my State. If we had a freight rate that was within the limits of reason the people out on those prairies could get lumber, produced within the limits of our own State, but from the Black Hills to the Missouri River the freight rate on lumber is almost as high as is the rate from the State of Washington to South Dakota, or from Georgia to South Dakota, and it is made practically prohibitory to the people on the prairies east of the Missouri River to use lumber that grows in the western borders of our State because of the extortion of the railways in that State, and because when the legislature has provided relief for the people there, a temporary injunction comes from an inferior Federal court, by telegraph, without any notice to the people of our State.

Now, we can delay and put these matters off and allow the irritation to grow, as it will grow, but I insist that this bill should receive serious consideration and it should not be the victim of undue delay.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the fact, if I desired to act in a manner that would invite and receive popular approval, that I should pursue exactly the opposite course from that which I have marked out for myself with reference to the proposed legislation.

Thousands of good people, God-fearing men and women in Kentucky, are pleading for the enactment of this bill into law; they seek the legislation solely for what they conceive to be for their country's good. No ulterior or selfish motive influences their action. Every right-thinking man would like to have their respect and approval of his official acts. But if one must violate the Constitution which he has sworn to support and maintain, and thus suffer the prostitution and self-abasement consequent upon a violation of that oath, the price which he pays to obtain their approval is too great. When a Member of this body is charged with the duty of construing the Constitution, the question as to the effect his decision may have on his personal fortunes should not for one moment be considered. When such a thought enters his mind he should, with due haste, exclaim, "Get thee behind me, Satan!"

Occasionally I receive a letter from one who knows that I am a strict constructionist, believing that all rights not granted to the Federal Government were reserved by the States and to the people, in which he says that the proposed legislation is good State rights doctrine. What I have always supposed was meant by State rights were such rights as were not granted to the Federal Government. I have never supposed these words meant the usurpation of any of the rights granted to the Federal Government or the right to have redelegated to the States the rights which had been granted to the Federal Government. From another person I received a letter in which the writer says the bill is constitutional because it is right. I received another letter from a gentleman who seems to be one of intelligence, and among other things he said:

> It is probably your opinion that it is unconstitutional, and probably, too, it may be so declared.

Notwithstanding this, he insisted that I should vote for the bill. Of course I could not hope to make an argument against the bill which would in the slightest degree affect the opinions of those who thus reason.

If our dual system of government is to be perpetuated, we must preserve the constitutional authority of the Federal as well as that of the State governments. The Members of both branches of the Congress promise to support the Constitution; they are certainly not supporting that instrument when they attempt to surrender to the States the authority to regulate interstate commerce, when the States without qualification or reservation expressly granted that authority to the Federal Government.

The bill as reported from the committee reads as follows:

> SECTION 1. That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale or wine, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.
> SEC. 2. That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State or Territory and before delivery to the consignee, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Section 1 is immature, impracticable, and, if permissible, I would say impossible. The bill is an incoherent and inconsistent piece of patchwork. The prohibition is made to depend upon the intent of some one with an undefined interest in the intoxicating liquor, whether it be a property interest or a lively interest arising from a desire to consume some of it is not stated, and the further fact that the liquor is received or held for sale in dry territory.

The section is not a prohibition against shipping intoxicating liquors. No penalty is prescribed for its violation, and perhaps the reason for this failure is because of what has been reported to have been said by Chief Justice Brian:

> It is trite law that the thought of man is not triable, for even the devil does not know what the thought of man is.

I have not tried to verify the quotation. Whether the Chief Justice made the statement or not, the rule as stated is correct.

Section 2 is inconsistent with section 1, as this section allows intoxicating liquor to be seized upon arrival in a State, regardless of the question of intent of those who had a direct or indirect interest in it.

A question which I will simply state, not discuss, might arise in Kentucky growing out of a situation there. Local option, not prohibition, is provided for in the constitution of the State. As a result of a vote in most of the counties local option is in force, and it is unlawful to sell liquor as a beverage. There is a statute in Kentucky by the terms of which it is made unlawful to ship intoxicating liquors, either from within or without the State, into dry territory, although the State and Federal courts have since held the act invalid so far as it was intended to affect an interstate shipment. It is lawful to sell intoxicating liquors in Lexington, Frankfort, Newport, Covington, Louisville, Owensboro, Paducah, and other places. So Kentucky, under her code of laws, makes it lawful to manufacture intoxicating liquors and leave the sale of it optional with certain political subdivisions. Suppose a shipment of intoxicating liquors was made in Pennsylvania to Lexington, Ky., it would have to pass through Kentucky over some routes more than 100 miles, and over the shortest route nearly 100 miles. Under the terms of the bill the liquor could be seized on its arrival in the State and before a delivery to the consignee. I will not stop to speculate as to the question which this statement of facts presents.

In the commercial world and by the Congress intoxicating liquors have been recognized as legitimate articles of commerce; if anything can be clearly determined by adjudication, it is that such liquors are a legitimate subject of commerce. In support of that I cited the case of Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) and the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Cook Brewing Co. (223 U. S., 90).

In Leisy against Hardin it was said:

> Ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale, and beer are subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic, like any other commodity in which a right of traffic exists, and are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world, the laws of Congress, and the decisions of courts.

This question is so well settled I deem it unnecessary to further discuss it.

At this point it may be stated that by section 8, Article I, Constitution of the United States, the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes" is given to Congress.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to invest the States with authority to prevent the shipment of intoxicating liquors from one State into another by seizing them, by virtue of existing laws or such as may hereafter be enacted, before they reach the consignee, whether such liquors are imported for sale in violation of State laws or for the personal use of the consignee.

If this bill should become a law and is held valid, then no person could have shipped into a dry State or a dry territory in a State liquor for his personal use. Yet no State, so far as I am aware, has declared the use of intoxicating liquors unlawful. In this connection it may be stated that the proposed legislation does not attempt to regulate commerce. On the contrary, it proposes to give to every State the right to prevent an interstate shipment of liquor by giving it the right, under whatever conditions it sees proper to impose, to seize it before delivery, thus giving each State the right to regulate interstate shipments of liquor in whatever way it may choose.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PAYNTER. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to interfere with the orderly course of the Senator's argument, but the statement which the Senator makes that this bill will stop the purchase for personal use of liquor is one that has been made a great deal, and is one that I absolutely deny. I wish the Senator would point out anything in the bill which warrants that assertion. I am willing to be convinced.

Mr. PAYNTER. If the Senator will bear with me in patience, I think I will show that the language of the bill does warrant the statement I have made.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator intend to discuss that question?

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to say in that connection that if the Senator will simply read section 2 of the bill he will find that in express terms it does attempt to authorize a State to interrupt an interstate shipment of liquor when it arrives within its borders for use, consumption, sale, or storage.

Mr. KENYON. I have read section 2 a good many times, and, in my judgment, it does not.

Mr. PAYNTER. If that is true, and the Senator still entertains the opinion he has just stated, it is useless for the Senator and myself to discuss the question. So I would very much prefer, Mr. President, to go along in an orderly way and discuss the subject without going off on some question that I have considered perhaps in some other part of my speech.

Some general propositions may be stated which seem to me do not need the citation of authorities to support them. Some facts may be stated about which there is no controversy. I shall state some of them.

The police power exists in the States as it existed at the time the National Government was created, and it still remains in the States. The National Government can not add to or diminish the police power of the States. There is a limitation between the sovereign power of a State and the Federal power, and it may be stated as follows:

That which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State, and that which belongs to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Liquor can not be manufactured, sold, or used under the protection of the Federal Government in any State that has prohibited it. When the State authorizes the manufacture, sale, or use of liquors, the Congress is without power to destroy such authority.

If the State can determine the subjects which shall be regulated, then its power is greater than that of the Federal Government in the matter of the regulation of commerce between the States.

If such power is conceded to exist in the States, then they must triumph over the Federal Government in the struggle for supremacy.

If the Congress can surrender to the States a power which the Constitution provides it alone shall exercise, then it is competent for the Congress to utterly overthrow the Constitution and subvert all the rights which the framers of it sought to preserve by it.

If a State can enact a law which will enable it to intercept an interstate shipment of goods as it arrives within its borders, then the State, and not the Congress, can regulate interstate commerce.

If a State can intercept and prevent the consignee from receiving goods, then it can regulate interstate commerce and control the commerce which arises in another State, and thus nullify the clause of the Constitution providing that the Congress should regulate interstate commerce, thus destroying that clause of the Constitution which was regarded by those who framed it as essential to the proper conduct of the business of the country—in fact, this was the clause upon which the entire fabric was constructed. This is true because it was well known by those who brought into existence the Constitution that interstate commerce could only be regulated by the Congress, and that chaos would reign in business without it. Without that clause of the Constitution the growth and development of the country would be paralyzed, stagnation would exist, and the energies of the people be destroyed.

One of the great questions that brought the States together for the purpose of making a "more perfect Union" was to free commerce from State discrimination, not to transfer the power of restriction. As the States recognized that such regulation could only be had by national authority, they unreservedly surrendered that question to national sovereignty.

Notwithstanding that sovereignty should alone be exercised in the regulation of commerce, still it is proposed that the Congress shall redelegate such authority to the States. The essence of the proposition is to allow the States to do that which is at least doubtful that the Congress can do, to wit, prohibit the interstate shipment of a legitimate article of commerce.

When the Congress undertakes to authorize a State to seize a legitimate article of commerce before it reaches the consignee the Congress is attempting to redelegate to the State its power to regulate interstate commerce, and to allow the State, in effect, to prohibit the interstate shipment of a legitimate article of commerce. To restate the proposition, the Congress of the United States is in substance attempting to confer an authority upon the States which is not constitutionally vested in itself.

If a carrier can not deliver to a consignee goods which are the subject of an interstate shipment, then we have the equivalent of a denial to one desiring to ship goods of the right to deliver to the carrier goods for shipment.

If the Congress can authorize or permit a State to prevent the delivery of goods to the consignee, then the same right exists in the Congress to authorize or permit a State to prohibit the shipment of goods, although such goods are regarded by the State where situated, by the commercial world, by the Congress, and by the decisions of the courts as legitimate articles of commerce. As already stated, the denial of the right to deliver goods is the exact equivalent to denying the right of shipment, for if the article of commerce can not be delivered to the consignee, then interstate commerce to that extent is destroyed.

The proposed legislation would have the effect of giving to the laws of the several States extraterritorial operation. That is the necessary consequence of allowing a State law to prohibit interstate shipment of merchandise and would destroy the right to contract beyond the limits of the State for shipment.

The effect of the proposed legislation would be to allow every State to stop every train crossing its borders and discharge its freight, lest it carry within the State prohibited merchandise.

In Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 422) the court said:

Undoubtedly the purpose of the act was to enable the laws of the several States to control the character of merchandise therein enumerated at an earlier date than would have been otherwise the case, but it is equally unquestionable that the act of Congress manifests no purpose to confer upon the States the power to give their statutes an extraterritorial operation, so as to subject persons and property beyond their borders to the restraints of their laws. If the act of Congress be construed as reaching the contract for interstate shipment made in another State, the necessary effect must be to give to the laws of the several States extraterritorial operation; for, as held in the Bowman case, the inevitable consequence of allowing a State law to forbid interstate shipments of merchandise would be to destroy the right to contract beyond the limits of the State for such shipments. If the construction claimed be upheld, it would be in the power of each State to compel every interstate-commerce train to stop before crossing its borders and discharge its freight, lest by crossing the line it might carry within the State merchandise of the character named, covered by the inhibitions of a State statute.

In Rhodes against Iowa, supra, at page 415, the court, in discussing the Bowman case, said:

After great consideration it was held that the law of the State of Iowa, in so far as it affected interstate commerce, was repugnant to the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution and was void. It was decided that the transportation of merchandise from one State into and across another was interstate commerce, and was protected from the operation of State laws from the moment of shipment whilst in transit and up to the ending of the journey by the delivery of the goods to the consignee at the place to which they were consigned.

In Bowman v. Railway Co. (125 U. S., 498, 490), the court said:

It may be said, however, that the right of the State to restrict or prohibit sales of intoxicating liquor within its limits, conceded to exist as a part of its police power, implies the right to prohibit its importation, because the latter is necessary to the effectual exercise of the former. The argument is that a prohibition of the sale can not be made effective, except by preventing the introduction of the subject of the sale; that if its entrance into the State is permitted, the traffic in it can not be suppressed. But the right to prohibit sales, so far as conceded to the States, arises only after the act of transportation has terminated, because the sales which the State may forbid are of things within its jurisdiction. Its power over them does not begin to operate until they are brought within the territorial limits which circumscribe it. It might be very convenient and useful in the execution of the policy of prohibition within the State to extend the powers of the State beyond its territorial limits, but such extraterritorial powers can not be assumed upon such an implication. On the contrary the nature of the case contradicts their existence, for if they belong to one State they belong to all and can not be exercised severally and independently. The attempt would necessarily produce that conflict and confusion which it was the very purpose of the Constitution by its delegations of national power to prevent.

The Supreme Court also said, in Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 424):

Whilst it is true that the right to sell free from State interference interstate-commerce merchandise was held in Leisy v. Hardin to be an essential incident to interstate commerce, it was yet but an incident, as the contract of sale within a State in its nature was usually subject to the control of the legislative authority of the State.

On the other hand, the right to contract for the transportation of merchandise from one State into or across another involved interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect and imported in its very essence a relation which necessarily must be governed by laws apart from the laws of the several States, since it embraced a contract which must come under the laws of more than one State.

The question involved here was ably discussed by Mr. Justice Catron in the License cases (5 How., 559-561), in which it is said:

The law and the decision apply equally to foreign and to domestic spirits, as they must do on the principles assumed in support of the law. The assumption is that the police power was not touched by the Constitution, but left to the States as the Constitution found it. This is admitted; and wherever a thing from character or condition is of a description to be regulated by that power in the State then the regulation may be made by the State, and Congress can not interfere. But this must always depend on facts, subject to legal ascertainment, so that the injured may have redress. And the fact must find its support in this, whether the prohibited article belongs to and is subject to be regulated as part of foreign commerce or of commerce among the States. If from its nature it does not belong to commerce, or if its condition, from putrescence or other cause, is such when it is about to enter the State that it no longer belongs to commerce, or, in other words, is not a commercial article, then the State power may exclude its introduction. And as an incident to this power a State may use means to ascertain the fact. And here is the limit between the sovereign power of the State and the Federal power; that is to say, that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State and that which does belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States. And to this limit must all the general views come, as I suppose, that were suggested in the reasoning of this court in the cases of Gibbons v. Ogden, Brown v. The State of Maryland, and New York v. Miln.

What, then, is the assumption of the State court? Undoubtedly in effect that the State had the power to declare what should be an article of lawful commerce in the particular State; and having declared that ardent spirits and wines were deleterious to morals and health, they ceased to be commercial commodities there, and that then the police power attached, and consequently the powers of Congress could not interfere. The exclusive State power is made to rest not on the fact of the state or condition of the article, nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the State laws and asserted as the State policy that it shall be excluded from commerce. And by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created in a case where it did not previously exist.

If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation, for it takes from Congress and leaves with the States the power to determine the commodities or articles of property which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Commerce may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated.

Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce instead of being paramount over the subject would become subordinate to the State police power, for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subjects of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation, is in effect the controlling one. The police power would not only be a formidable rival but in a struggle must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated.

The same process of legislation and reasoning adopted by the State and its courts could bring within the police power any article of consumption that a State might wish to exclude, whether it belonged to that which was drank or to food and clothing, and the nearly equal claims to propriety, as malt liquors and the produce of fruits other than grapes stand on no higher grounds than the light wines of this and other countries excluded in effect by the law as it now stands. And it would be only another step to regulate real or supposed extravagance in food and clothing. And in this connection it may be proper to say that the three States whose laws are now before us had in view an entire prohibition from use of spirits and wines of every description, and that their main scope and object is to enforce exclusive temperance as a policy of State, under the belief that such a policy will best subserve the interests of society; and that to this end more than to any other has the sovereign power of these States been exerted, for it was admitted on the argument that no licenses are issued and that exclusion exists, so far as the laws can produce the result—at least in some of the States—and that this was the policy of the law. For these reasons, I think, the case can not depend on the reserved power in the State to regulate its own police.

In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 557) the Supreme Court spoke of the reasoning of Mr. Justice Catron as "sagacious observations," and quoted them with approval, and then said (p. 559):

And the learned judge reached the conclusion that the law of New Hampshire, which particularly raised the question, might be sustained as a regulation of commerce, lawful because not repugnant to any actual exercise of the commercial power by Congress. In respect of this the opposite view has since prevailed, but the argument retains its force in its bearing upon the purview of the police power as not concurrent with and necessarily not superior to the commercial power.

The Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, of which Hon. Philander C. Knox was a member, had under consideration bills somewhat like the one here presented for our consideration, and in discussing them the committee, through Mr. Knox, said:

These bills propose a plan to prevent the use of liquor through a regulation of interstate commerce by States that have no power over such commerce, permitted to do so by a Nation that has no jurisdiction over such use.

The Nation is not asked to supplement any action of the States prohibiting the use of liquors, but to allow the States to prevent the use, not by legislating against it, but by seizing importations before they reach the consignee. A more complete perversion and reversing of national and State powers I can not imagine.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I will remind the Senator from Kentucky that the bill which Senator Knox was discussing was almost identical with the second section of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. PAYNTER. I think perhaps there was more than one bill before the committee, but there was a bill which, I think, was substantially the same as section 2 of the bill under consideration.

I think that Mr. Knox's statement of the question is an admirable one. No better one can be made. It shows a keen comprehension of the respective powers of the Federal and State Governments and a great capacity for lucid and concise statement of constitutional principles.

As I have said, this bill does not purport to regulate commerce between the States. It might more properly be denominated a bill to aid the States in the enforcement of their police power, or, rather, extending the police power of the States. Thus it is an attempt to exercise a jurisdiction alone possessed by the States. In order to do this the Congress is asked to subvert the most valuable clause of the Federal Constitution.

The Supreme Court, in the case of In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 562), said:

It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State.

Therefore, Mr. President, when it is stated in the bill under consideration (or the Wilson bill) that an article at a certain time shall be subject to the police power of a State the Congress can not thereby add to the police power of the State.

Such a statement, if viewed from a Constitutional aspect, can not extend the police power of the State. It would be more accurate, I think, if Congress should say that the interstate shipment was terminated upon delivery of the article. Then there would be no reference made to the police power of the State and would not appear by words that Congress was endeavoring to add to the police power of the State. This would be better, as Congress can neither confer upon or diminish the police power of the State. In my opinion it is very inaccurate to make a declaration that at a certain period it shall be within the police power of the State, because when the shipment is terminated the police power of the State takes hold and control of the article that is shipped. So, as I say, it is very misleading to make a statement of that kind in the bill. It is not constitutionally accurate. It is not the province of Congress to define the police power of the States. It is the province of Congress to make uniform rules to regulate commerce; not, however, to confer such power upon the States.

Under the second section of the bill it is attempted to permit the State to seize liquors imported for personal use. Without discussing the question, I desire to quote from Vance v. Vandercook (170 U. S., 455), wherein the court said:

> The right of the citizen of another State to avail himself of interstate commerce can not be held to be subject to the issuing of a certificate by an officer of the State of South Carolina without admitting the power of that officer to control the exercise of the right. But the right arises from the Constitution of the United States; it exists wholly independent of the will of either the lawmaking or the executive power of the State; it takes its origin outside of the State of South Carolina, and finds its support in the Constitution of the United States. Whether or not it may be exercised depends solely upon the will of the person making the shipment, and can not be in advance controlled or limited by the action of the State in any department of its government.

It was said in Heyman v. Southern Railway (203 U. S., 274–275):

> The interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution guarantees the right to ship merchandise from one State into another, and protects it until the termination of the shipment by delivery at the place of consignment, and this right is wholly unaffected by the act of Congress, which allows State authority to attach to the original package before sale, but only after delivery. (Scott v. Donald and Rhodes v. The State of Iowa, supra.) It follows that under the Constitution of the United States every resident of South Carolina is free to receive for his own use liquor from other States, and that the inhibitions of a State statute do not operate to prevent liquors from other States from being shipped into such State on the order of a resident for his use.

In the case of Bowman v. Chicago & North Western Railway Co. (125 U. S., 493), discussing legislation similar to that which is here proposed, the court characterized the result that would flow therefrom as "commercial anarchy," and there said:

> Can it be supposed that by omitting any express declarations on the subject Congress has intended to submit to the several States the decision of the question in each locality of what shall and what shall not be articles of traffic in the interstate commerce of the country? If so, it has left to each State, according to its own caprice and arbitrary will, to discriminate for or against every article grown, produced, manufactured, or sold in any State and sought to be introduced as an article of commerce into any other. If the State of Iowa may prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors from all other States, it may also include tobacco, or any other article, the use or abuse of which it may deem deleterious. It may not choose even to be governed by considerations growing out of the health, comfort, or peace of the community. Its policy may be directed to other ends. It may choose to establish a system directed to the promotion and benefit of its own agriculture, manufactures, or arts of any description, and prevent the introduction and sale within its limits of any or of all articles that it may select as coming into competition with those which it seeks to protect. The police power of the State would extend to such cases as well as to those in which it was sought to legislate in behalf of the health, peace, and morals of the people. In view of the commercial anarchy and confusion that would result from the diverse exertions of power by the several States of the Union, it can not be supposed that the Constitution or Congress have intended to limit the freedom of commercial intercourse among the people of the several States. "It can not be too strongly insisted upon," said this court in Wabash, etc., Railroad Co. v. Illinois (118 U. S., 557, 572), "that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it, that the commerce clause was intended to secure. This clause giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution." (Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S., 566, 574; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419, 446.) And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States, which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country the State within whose limits a part of the transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce.

UNIFORM SYSTEM.

To this point I have considered the effect of the commerce clause of the Constitution upon the proposed legislation. My opinion is, as appears from my discussion, that the proposed legislation is violative of that clause.

While it is not necessary for the purpose of my argument that I should do so, still it is my desire to call the attention of the Senate to another provision of the Constitution which I think has a bearing upon the question. However, I want it distinctly understood that I am of the opinion that it is not necessary for any Senator to agree with me in the suggestions I am about to make in order to reach the conclusion that he should vote against the bill. As the question under consideration is important, involving a constitutional question, I think it proper to make the suggestion which I purpose.

While the primary purpose of section 2, Article IV, was to be a restrictive power on the States, yet the language does not confine its restrictive effort to the States alone, for if there are no other provisions of the Constitution which would prevent Congress from doing the thing therein prohibited, that article would do so. It is a constitutional guaranty which the legislatures of States, Congress, and the courts should respect. If I am in error as to this, then most of the argument which I shall make with reference thereto is applicable to the question of the necessity for a uniform rule for the regulation of interstate commerce.

Federal laws affecting the citizens of the United States must be uniform in their application, for it is provided by section 2, Article IV, of the Constitution, that:

> The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

This provision forbids Congress to enact a general law which gives citizens of one State privileges not given to those of another State. The Congress can not constitutionally impose restrictions upon the commerce of the citizens of one State that are not imposed on the citizens of another State.

If the Congress by legislation prevents citizens of one State from importing recognized articles of commerce, while by legislation such right is granted to the citizens of another State, the Constitution is violated. If the right to ship intoxicating liquors from Kentucky to Iowa is denied, then the right to ship the same kind of liquors from New York to Iowa must be denied. The Congress can not declare that intoxicating liquors are proper articles of commerce for the use of citizens of the United States residing in one State, and declare that the same kind of liquors are improper articles of commerce for the use of citizens of the United States residing in another State.

It is proposed by this bill, in effect, to do that very thing by attempting to give permission to some States to enact laws which recognize intoxicating liquors as proper articles of commerce for the consumption of their citizens, while other States may enact laws denying that intoxicating liquors are proper articles of commerce for the consumption of their citizens. This illustration shows that the Congress is asked to grant the States authority to enact laws which deny to the citizens of one State privileges which the laws of another State grant to citizens thereof. In other words, the Congress is asked to authorize the States to do that which is forbidden by the Constitution.

If it were conceded that the Congress has the power to prohibit the interstate shipment of liquors, I feel sure that no one would contend that an act would be valid which allowed Kentucky to ship liquors to the Eastern States while denying to the citizens of any other State the right to ship liquors to the Eastern or any other States of the Union.

To enact a law which allows a citizen and consignee in one State to receive an article of commerce by an interstate shipment and deny a citizen and consignee in another State the right to receive a like article of commerce is certainly a denial of privileges to the citizens of one State the privileges enjoyed by those of another State. This is entirely apart from the right of the State to legislate as to the disposition of the article after it has been delivered to the citizen and consignee.

If a rule or regulation of commerce can be said to be established by the bill, then it is only such as may be established by the States. If the States do not pass laws establishing a rule with relation to the interstate shipment of liquors, then no rule exists.

Therefore it is apparent that Congress has surrendered the power to make the rule to regulate commerce to the States. So it is reduced to this: No State legislation, no rule.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the Court in Bartemeyer v. Iowa (18 Wall., 136) has held that the right to sell a prohibited article can never be deemed one of the privileges and immunities of the citizen which are sought to be preserved by the fourteenth amendment.

That is certainly true, because the police power of the State is recognized under the Constitution, and it is not sought by the fourteenth amendment to diminish or affect the police power of the State; and, therefore, the State having the power to regulate or prohibit the sale of liquors, no one could successfully claim that the fourteenth amendment secures to him protection against the police power of the State.

An attempt is being made by the bill under consideration to surrender the power to regulate commerce, which is vested in the Congress. It is an attempt not only to surrender the power of Congress to regulate commerce but at the same time, by that act of Congress and an act of the legislature, to commit an additional violation on the Constitution by allowing some of the States to deprive the citizens of such States of the privileges which are enjoyed by the citizens of other States. It is an attempt to have both sovereignties combine to violate both provisions of the Constitution, to which I have called attention.

If a citizen of one State is deprived of the right as consignee to have delivered to him an interstate shipment of an article of commerce, and such right is recognized in a citizen of another State, certainly it is depriving the citizens of one State of a right that is enjoyed by the citizens of other States, and in doing this the commerce clause of the Constitution is disregarded as well as the provisions of section 2, Article IV.

So long as intoxicating liquors are legitimate articles of commerce their owners should enjoy the same right to have them transported as the owners of other articles of commerce, and therefore Congress must furnish the same protection to them until they reach the consignee as to other articles of commerce, and certainly they are entitled to the same protection under the Constitution as other articles of commerce.

I do not now recall any case in the Supreme Court involving the effect of legislation somewhat similar to that here proposed where the court expressly decided what relation section 2, Article IV, of the Constitution had to such question. In the dissenting opinion in the Lottery case delivered by Chief Justice Fuller, in which Justices Brewer, Shiras, and Peckham agreed, there is a general discussion of this clause of the Constitution. It is there said:

> Congress is forbidden to lay any tax or duty on articles exported from any State, and while that has been applied to exports to a foreign country, it seems to me that it was plainly intended to apply to interstate exportation as well. Congress is forbidden to give preference by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; and duties, imposts, and excises must be uniform throughout the United States.
> "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." This clause of the second section of Article IV was taken from the fourth article of confederation, which provided that "the free inhabitants of each of these States * * * shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and egress to and from any other State and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce"; while other parts of the same article were also brought forward in Article IV of the Constitution.
> Mr. Justice Miller, in the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall., 36, 75), says that there can be but little question that the purpose of the fourth article of the Confederation and of this particular clause of the Constitution "is the same and that the privileges and immunities intended are the same in each."
> Thus it is seen that the right of passage of persons and property from one State to another can not be prohibited by Congress. But that does not challenge the legislative power of a sovereign nation to exclude foreign persons or commodities or place an embargo, perhaps not permanent, upon foreign ships or manufactures.

I have not discussed the question as to the power of Congress to prohibit the interstate shipment of liquors, because the proposed legislation does not go to that extent. If the power exists, the time for its exercise has not arrived, for it is said by the Supreme Court in Scott v. McDowell (165 U. S., 91) that—

> So long as the State legislation continues to recognize wines, beer, and spirituous liquors as articles of lawful consumption and commerce so long must continue the duty of the Federal courts to afford such use and commerce the same measure of protection under the Constitution and laws of the United States as is given to other articles.

I have not discussed the Lottery case, because the proposed legislation is entirely different from statute there under consideration.

To relieve ourselves of responsibility and criticism we should not improperly dump constitutional questions upon our Supreme Court, to have it assume unnecessary responsibility and receive, perchance, criticism. To do this is not fair or honorable and can not be justified, although the members of that court are not elected biennially or sexennially.

If we should have a doubt as to the constitutionality of a bill, whether such doubt arises from a careful study of the question or whether it be superinduced by a consideration of the consequences to us for our act, it is our duty to vote against the bill. The rule of action for government of the Congress is unlike the rule observed by the courts in determining the constitutionality of an act, for the court resolves all doubts in favor of its validity, while the lawmaking body must resolve all doubts as to its constitutionality against the passage of the bill. This doctrine is well stated by Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Law, second edition, page 160, as follows:

> This course is the opposite to that which is required of the legislature in considering the question of passing a proposed law. Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution; they are chosen to do what it permits and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions, they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support.

The Congress should be governed by this rule. If we are not, then we disregard a sane and safe rule. Courts resolve the doubts in favor of the validity of an act, because they credit members of the lawmaking branch of the Government with having passed the act believing it to be valid. When the Congress has solemnly proclaimed its belief in the validity of an act the courts when in doubt will not allow their doubts to cause them to adjudge invalid an act when the Congress has declared it a valid act.

If it becomes the rule of the Congress to resolve doubts in favor of the constitutionality of an act and the courts resolve all doubts in favor of its validity, then we have the spectacle of an act being adjudged valid when both the Congress and the courts doubt its validity. If such a rule is to prevail, what a humiliating and lamentable spectacle would be presented to the country and the world.

If the Congress should pass an act and add to it a clause expressing a doubt as to its constitutionality, would the courts in passing upon the question of its constitutionality resolve doubts in favor of the validity of the act? Certainly they would not do so, but on the contrary would announce the rule that all doubts under the circumstances of the case should be resolved against the validity of the act. If they did not do that we would have an enforceable act when both the Congress and the courts doubt its validity.

It is important that we should preserve the fundamental law of the land. It was made to secure our lives, liberty, and property, and as a guaranty of the same rights to those who are to follow us. We should preserve it, not violate it, because perchance in some particular case we would have it otherwise than it is. If those who have been honored with high public position, because of their supposed knowledge, patriotism, and integrity disregard the Constitution, then how can those who have trusted and honored them be expected to maintain their confidence in their public servants or reverence for our institutions? Why not preserve and uphold our Constitution, which was said by an illustrious man to be the greatest instrument ever stricken at one time from the brain of man? If it should be changed, let it be done in the manner prescribed by its terms; it is corrupt and hazardous to do it otherwise. In the farewell address, publicly read once each year in this Chamber, of him who was "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," it is said:

> If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in a way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for, though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

If there are those here who believe that this bill is unconstitutional or who doubt its constitutionality, let them by their votes say they are willing to maintain the obligation which they took upon assuming official position. Let them present to the present and future generations a shining example of courage and devotion to duty. What greater achievement could a public servant desire than to merit and have placed upon the tablet erected to his memory these words:

> He discharged every public duty conscientiously and fearlessly, and in so doing enjoyed his own self-respect and merited that of his countrymen.

Did I take a selfish view of this matter, I would want to see this bill pass, for an early vindication of my position would surely come in the form of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. If the bill fails to pass, my vindication will be postponed until a subsequent Congress passes a bill similar to the one under consideration.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to give notice that at the close of the morning business on Monday I will, with the permission of the Senate, discuss briefly Senate bill 4043.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, of which he has just given notice, I shall desire to address the Senate upon the same measure.

Mr. KENYON. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that there are a number of Senators, I think, who desire to speak on this bill, and as the vote is to be taken between 3 and 6 o'clock, it might be advisable if we could take up the bill at the close of the morning business on Monday.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand that that is the effect of the notice given by the Senator from Ohio and by myself.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Ohio gave notice that he would speak at the close of the routine morning business?

Mr. POMERENE. I have just given that notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the call of the roll 60 Senators have answered to their names and a quorum is present. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, at the close of my remarks on Wednesday I was about to quote from two decisions of the United States Supreme Court relating to the use of surplus water. Those decisions sustain the contention that the right exists to appropriate and dispose of surplus water power in case an improvement has been made for the promotion of navigation. These two leading cases arose from circumstances relating to an improvement in the Fox River in the State of Wisconsin. The first is reported in One hundred and forty-second United States, page 254. The other, arising under somewhat different circumstances but relating to the same improvement, is reported in One hundred and seventy-second United States, page 68.

I especially desire while reading from these cases that there may be no interruption. The cases speak for themselves, and the material included in them covers almost every phase of this subject, and will make it, I think, much clearer to the Senate than could be derived from any interlocutory discussion.

In the year 1846, in which the State of Wisconsin was admitted to the Union, Congress granted certain lands to the State for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers. The legislature, by an act approved in 1848, accepted the grant, and by a subsequent act (p. 256), entitled "An act to provide for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, and connect the same by a canal," created a board of public works to superintend the construction of the improvement. It was provided by this act that the water power created by the erection of a dam should belong to the State, subject to the future action of the legislature. The board was limited in their expenditures to the proceeds of the sale of the land granted by Congress. A contract was made soon after with private parties for the improvement.

In the year 1853 the State, finding it embarrassing to proceed with the improvement, created a corporation, known as the Fox & Wisconsin Improvement Co., the object of which was to relieve the State from indebtedness and at the same time to secure the prosecution of the work. A contract was made with this company, under which all the dams, locks, water power, and so forth, were vested in it.

The company built a dam and provided for the utilization of the water power, and, in the belief that it owned the hydraulic power, bought lands adjacent to the canal for the purpose of rendering the power available. This company met with embarrassment, and under the foreclosure of a mortgage its property was sold. In the meantime, the Federal Government was requested to take over the improvement. Action was taken looking to that end about the year 1870. A few years later the Federal Government again assumed control and built another dam distinct from the first, which was completed in the year 1876. In the meantime the Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co. had been incorporated and became vested under the foreclosure with all rights in the water power. A conveyance was made by this company to the Government of the United States in which it reserved the water power.

I am thoroughly aware, Mr. President, that the argument will be made that this creates an exceptional situation; that the State could grant rights to this Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co. under which it could utilize water power; and that those rights are the basis of its contention in the litigation which occurred. A careful examination of the decision utterly disproves that contention, however. In the first instance, it was conceded in the argument of counsel, who denied the right to use this surplus power, that the State could not make expenditures or appropriations for the development of water power.

Throughout the whole opinion the reasoning of the court is based upon general principles relating to the right of the agency or State which controls the navigation to utilize the surplus water power. Again, the decision in One hundred and seventy-second United States is based upon circumstances under which the Government had taken control of the improvement, had changed the locality of the dam, and was prosecuting the work itself.

In the meantime a rival company, known as the Kaukauna Power Co., gained possession of the three lots abutting upon this improvement alongside the pond which had been created by the dam and extending below the dam. It sought to construct a diversion canal through its lands. The Green Bay Co. applied to the court in Wisconsin for an injunction preventing the power company from interfering with its right to enjoy the surplus water.

The circuit court, the lower court in the State of Wisconsin, dismissed the petition, but the plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in which forum the judgment below was reversed. An injunction was granted against the Kaukauna Co., the one owning the abutting lots, and it was held that the right to utilize the power belonged to the Green Bay Co. From that decision an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I wish to read, Mr. President, briefly from the argument of the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, those who opposed the claim that the surplus power belonged to the one who had the navigation. Their contention was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States.

> The plaintiffs in error admit that it was of vital interest to the State and to those intrusted with the preservation and maintenance of the improvement that they should have the entire control of the dam, embankments, canals, and all appliances necessary for the purposes of navigation, as well as of the waters necessary for navigation in the pond created by the dam. But they deny that the absolute control of such water involves the ownership or the right to the use of the surplus over and above what is necessary for the purposes of navigation. They deny that the surplus water power is either necessary or convenient for the purposes of navigation.

I am quoting from page 265, and I quote from this to show what the contention was which was overruled. The Supreme Court by Mr. Justice Brown says on page 271—I read this to give the facts relied upon:

> After the building of said new dam by the United States, as aforesaid, it, the said United States, constructed and extended the said embankment along the southerly shore of said Fox River, on said lot 5, from the said old dam downstream to, and joined and terminated the same upon, its said new dam, as the same is now in use; and these defendants state, upon information and belief, that neither the United States or any other party ever by purchase, condemnation, dedication, or in any other way acquired of or from the owner of said lot 5 the right to so construct or abut said new dam upon said lot 5, or to so lengthen or construct said new part of said embankment thereupon, etc.

I read, however, especially from pages 272 and 274. This goes into the subject so thoroughly that I will read these pages at length:

The case of the plaintiff canal company depends primarily, as stated above, upon the legality of the legislative act of 1848, whereby the State assumed to reserve to itself any water power which should be created by the erection of the dam across the river at this point. No question is made of the power of the State to construct or authorize the construction of this improvement and to devote to it the proceeds of the land grant of the United States. The improvement of the navigation of a river is a public purpose, and the sequestration or appropriation of land or other property, therefore, for such purpose is doubtless a proper exercise of the authority of the State under its power of eminent domain. Upon the other hand, it is probably true that it is beyond the competency of the State to appropriate to itself the property of individuals for the sole purpose of creating a water power to be leased for manufacturing purposes. This would be a case of taking the property of one man for the benefit of another, which is not a constitutional exercise of the right of eminent domain. But if, in the erection of a public dam for a recognized public purpose, there is necessarily produced a surplus of water which may properly be used for manufacturing purposes there is no sound reason why the State may not retain to itself the power of controlling or disposing of such water as an incident of its right to make such improvement. Indeed, it might become very necessary to retain the disposition of it in its own hands in order to preserve at all times a sufficient supply for the purposes of navigation. If the riparian owners were allowed to tap the pond at different places and draw off the water for their own use, serious consequences might arise not only in connection with the public demand for the purposes of navigation, but between the riparian owners themselves as to the proper proportion each was entitled to draw—controversies which could only be avoided by the State reserving to itself the immediate supervision of the entire supply. As there is no need of the surplus running to waste, there was nothing objectionable in permitting the State to let out the use of it to private parties and thus reimburse itself for the expenses of the improvement.

The value of this water power created by the dam was much greater than that of the river in its unimproved state, in the hands of the riparian proprietors who had not the means to make it available. These proprietors lost nothing that was useful to them, except the technical right to have the water flow as it had been accustomed and the possibility of their being able sometime to improve it. If the State could condemn this use of the water with the other property of the riparian owner it might raise a revenue from it sufficient to complete the work which might otherwise fail. There was every reason why a water power thus created should belong to the public rather than to the riparian owners. Indeed, it seems to have been the practice, not only in New York, but in Ohio, in Wisconsin, and perhaps in other States in authorizing the erection of dams for the purpose of navigation or other public improvement, to reserve the surplus of water thereby created to be leased to private parties under the authority of the State; and where the surplus thus created was a mere incident to securing an adequate amount of water for the public improvement, such legislation, it is believed, has been uniformly sustained. Thus, in Cooper v. Williams (4 Ohio, 253), the law authorizing the construction of the Miami Canal, from Dayton to Cincinnati, empowered the canal commissioners to dispose of the surplus water power of the feeder for the benefit of the State, and their action in so disposing of the water was justified. The ruling was repeated in the same case, Fifth Ohio, 391.

I think it is unnecessary for me to read these other cases, but I may remark incidentally that this is similar to a power that is exercised by numerous counties in the various States. They build courthouses. In their construction there is an amount of extra space. That extra space is leased to lawyers for a compensation, just as a private owner would lease his property. It has been held by the courts, and very properly no doubt, that when the general public use fails, the incidental use fails with it.i For instance, in the State of Massachusetts there is a decision by Chief Justice Shaw to the effect that, although in the building of a market house it is perfectly proper to construct an auditorium in the upper portion, which may be leased and a revenue derived from it, yet if the use for a market house fails or is abandoned the right to lease the incidental portion also fails with it.

Again, on page 275, the court says:

The true distinction seems to be between cases where the dam is erected for the express or apparent purpose of obtaining a water power to lease to private individuals, or where in building a dam for a public improvement a wholly unnecessary excess of water is created, and cases where the surplus is a mere incident to the public improvement and a reasonable provision for securing an adequate supply of water at all times for such improvement.

Then, further, on page 276, it is said:

So long as the dam was erected for the bona fide purpose of furnishing an adequate supply of water for the canal, and was not a colorable device for creating a water power, the agents of the State are entitled to great latitude of discretion in regard to the height of the dam and the head of water to be created, and while the surplus in this case may be unnecessarily large there does not seem to have been any bad faith or abuse of discretion on the part of these charged with the construction of the improvement. Courts should not scan too jealously their conduct in this connection if there be no reason to doubt that they were animated solely by a desire to promote the public interests, nor can they undertake to measure with nicety the exact amount of water required for the purposes of the public improvement. Under the circumstances of this case we think it within the power of the State to retain within its immediate control such surplus as might incidentally be created by the erection of the dam.

Again, on page 281, I find the following:

The dam was built for a public purpose, and the act provided that if, in its construction, any water power was incidentally created it should belong to the State, and might be sold or leased in order that the proceeds of such sale or lease might assist in defraying the expenses of the improvement. A ruling which would allow a single riparian owner upon the pond created by this dam to take to himself one-half of the surplus water without having contributed anything toward the creation of such surplus or to the public improvement, would savor strongly of an appropriation of public property for private use. If any such water power were incidentally created by the erection of a dam it was obviously intended that it should belong to the public and be used for their benefit, and not for the emolument of a private riparian proprietor.

I read also from volume 172. The case begins on page 58. It will be noticed that in the earlier decision the word "State" is very generally used, while in the later the term "United States" is very generally employed. The first seems to relate more to State ownership and control during the continuance of that control, and the other decision to the changed conditions created when the United States took over the improvements. I read from the bottom of page 68:

Whether the water power, incidentally created by the erection and maintenance of the dam and canal for the purpose of navigation in Fox River, is subject to control and appropriation by the United States, owning and operating those public works, or by the State of Wisconsin, within whose limits Fox River lies, is the decisive question in this case.

Upon the undisputed facts contained in the record, we think it clear that the canal company—

That was a case where the lessee leased from the Government of the United States—

We think it is clear that the canal company is possessed of whatever rights to the use of this incidental water power that could be validly granted by the United States.

It goes on to say that the Fox River is a navigable stream, and quotes a familiar decision in the case of The Montello, Twentieth Wallace, and states that the Supreme Court reversed the decision of the lower court, finding this was not a navigable stream, and held that the Fox River is a stream of a national character, and that steamboats navigating its waters are subject to governmental regulation.

I also wish to read from this decision, on pages 80, 81, and 82, beginning on page 80:

The substantial meaning of the transaction was—

And I wish to call especial attention to this part of it, because of its bearing upon the question of whether this was a privilege derived from the United States.

The substantial meaning of the transaction was that the United States granted to the canal company the right to continue in the possession and enjoyment of the water powers and the lots appurtenant thereto, subject to the rights and control of the United States as owning and operating the public works.

A little later it is stated:

The method by which this arrangement was effected, namely, by a reservation in the deed, was an apt one and quite as efficacious as if the entire property had been conveyed to the United States by one deed and the reserved properties had been reconveyed to the canal company by another.

That is, it is the same as if the United States had possessed it all and then conveyed the water power to the Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co. To continue:

So far therefore as the water powers and appurtenant lots are regarded as property, it is plain that the title of the canal company thereto can not be controverted, and we think it is equally plain that the mode and extent of the use and enjoyment of such property by the canal company fall within the sole control of the United States. At what points in the dam and canal the water for power may be withdrawn and the quantity which can be treated as surplus with due regard to navigation must be determined by the authority which owns and controls that navigation.

Not the State of Wisconsin, but "the authority which owns and controls that navigation," which was in this case the Government of the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I should prefer to proceed. This is all connected. I will be glad to yield to the Senator from New York later.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator will pardon a question at that point, do I understand the Senator from Ohio to claim that the United States owns the navigation under the commerce clause of the Constitution?

Mr. BURTON. Of course whether it owns or does not own it has little bearing on this subject. It has that control which is the incident of trusteeship, and you may almost say of ownership.

Which owns and controls that navigation—

Is the language of the decision.

What use is there here of talking about ownership? Who is in control of the navigation? Who owns the navigation if it has any owner? The United States of America under its paramount power.

In such matters there can be no divided empire.

That is, you can not put the control of the navigation in one hand and put the control of the water power there generated in another. You must keep them together. That is the sound expression not only of law but of fundamental policy and, I might add, of good business as well. From page 81 I quote this:

Several cases are cited in the briefs for the defendants in error, wherein it has been decided by State supreme courts of high authority that whatever remains of the stream, beyond what is wanted for the public improvement, and which continues to flow over the dam and down the original channel of the river, belongs to riparian owners upon the stream in the same manner as if the State dam had not been erected.

The court goes on to say:

Our examination of the cases so cited has not enabled us to perceive that they are applicable to the present subject. In none of them have we found that, by the State legislation, was there a fund created out of the use of the surplus water to be expended in the completion and maintenance of the public improvement.

That brushes aside all these cases as not analogous either to the one under consideration or to the proposed project which we now have before us.

As we have seen, the entire legislation, State and Federal, in the present instance has had in view the dedication of the water powers incidentally created by the dams and canal to raising a fund to aid in the erection, completion, and maintenance of the public works—and, as we have further seen, provision was made in the Federal act of 1875 for the ascertainment and payment of damages, in respect to which this court said—

Just exactly this case—

Arrangement is made here for the ascertainment and payment of damages. That responsibility is imposed upon the Connecticut River Co. They are compelled to secure the riparian rights. In the last paragraph the court says:

Our conclusion, then, is that, as by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin there was drawn into question the validity of an authority exercised under the United States—

Let those who say this was an authority exercised by the State of Wisconsin bear in mind that the court in the very last paragraph gives us the reason for taking jurisdiction of the case, namely, that—

Our conclusion, then, is that, as by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin there was drawn into question the validity of an authority exercised under the United States, to wit, the granting of the said water powers and easement, and the decision was against the validity of such authority, thereby depriving the plaintiff in error of property without due process of law, the judgment of that court must be, and is hereby, reversed.

This case was again before the court on an application for a rehearing, and the Supreme Court again said, in volume 173, page 190:

While the courts of the State may legitimately take cognizance of controversies between the riparian owners concerning the use and apportionment of the waters flowing in the nonnavigable parts of the stream, they can not interfere by mandatory injunction or otherwise with the control of the surplus water power incidentally created by the dam and canal now owned and operated by the United States.

At any rate, the works are owned by the United States; whether the water was owned or not is utterly immaterial, because the absolute control belongs to the United States.

Next, Mr. President, I want to lay down the proposition that that which the Government may do directly it may do indirectly in such a case as this. I do not think I need go beyond a single quotation from the United States Supreme Court Reports found in volume 127, at page 1. This was in reference to the building, I believe, of the Pacific Railroad:

Congress has authority in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the several States to construct, or authorize individuals or corporations to construct, railroads across the States and Territories of the United States.

That is, the Government of the United States may go into the Connecticut River and make this improvement directly, or it may authorize a corporation or individual to carry out the same great purpose, namely, the promotion of navigation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. Just at that point, before proceeding with a different phase of his argument——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand that this river is navigable throughout its length?

Mr. BURTON. The Senators from Vermont can tell better than I. I fancy it is not navigable up in Vermont; but, in answer to the question of the Senator from Florida, it is sufficient to say that it is navigable both above and below the location of the proposed dam. I gave the figures in my remarks on Wednesday.

Mr. FLETCHER. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to call his attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of Florida with which he might want to deal in this discussion. Our supreme court, in the case of State v. Gebring (56 Fla., 603)—I will not take the time to read any extensive portions of the opinion——

Mr. BURTON. What is the point in it?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will only read one or two of the headnotes. The court says:

6. For the purpose of aiding navigation or commerce, or of encouraging new industries and the development of natural or artificial resources in the interest of all the people, the State may grant reasonable and limited rights and privileges to individuals in the use of lands under navigable waters in the State, but such privileges should not unreasonably impair the rights of the whole people of the State in the use of the waters or the lands thereunder for the purposes implied by law, nor relieve the State of the control and regulation of the uses afforded by the lands and the waters thereon.

Another headnote says:

4. The State can not abdicate general control over the lands under navigable waters within the State, since such abdication would be inconsistent with the implied legal duty of the State to preserve and control such lands and the waters thereon and the use of them for the public good.

Another headnote is to the same effect.

Mr. BURTON. I take it that is good law, but it seems to refer, however, to a nonnavigable stream.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it refers to lands under navigable waters, the lands——

Mr. BURTON. I have already discussed that at considerable length. Does the Senator contend that the State of Florida has any such rights in the bed of a stream that it could authorize the construction of a building or a factory by a private individual there?

Mr. FLETCHER. So long as it did not interfere with the general use of the water for navigation purposes and for such purposes as the public itself had an interest in.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Florida maintain that, as against the United States Government, the State could withhold a portion of the bed of a stream from occupancy, say, for building a pier or a bridge or anything of that kind?

Mr. FLETCHER. I claim that the State itself owns the land under the navigable waters and the lands up to and including low and high water, and that the State not only owns the land but that it also owns the right to the use of the waters so long as it does not interfere with the general use for navigation purposes.

Mr. BURTON. What is meant by "the general use"?

Mr. FLETCHER. The public have a right, of course, to the navigable waters; that they shall remain navigable, and that they shall be unobstructed for navigation purposes; but, beyond that, it seems to me that the General Government has no power or control. I will read on that point the fifth headnote of this decision. It is as follows:

5. The rights of the people of the State in the navigable waters and the lands thereunder, including the shores or spaces between ordinary high and low water marks, are designed for the public welfare, and the State may regulate such rights and the uses of the waters and the lands thereunder for the benefit of the whole people of the State as circumstances may demand subject, of course, to the powers of Congress in the premises.

Mr. BURTON. Subject to the power of Congress, of course. I have discussed at considerable length the question of what was the right of the State in the bed of a stream. It is not really of any importance in this particular case because, as long ago as 1824, the State of Connecticut granted to this Connecticut River Co. the right to improve that stream for the purpose of navigation. I also called attention to the fact that a court in the State of Connecticut itself had held that where, under the authority of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, a new channel was dug along the shore which interfered with the enjoyment of oyster beds—which, of course, are substantive property—the owners of the oyster beds were not entitled to compensation.

I think I can clear this situation as to the right of a State as opposed to that of the United States by reading a sentence or two from the syllabus of an opinion in Stockton, Attorney General of New Jersey, against The Baltimore & New York Railroad Co. and others. It was decided as a circuit-court case in New Jersey in 1887. The decision was rendered by Justice Bradley, of the Supreme Court. It is true the case was never taken to the Supreme Court, but in the case of Luxton against North River Bridge Co., in One hundred and fifty-third United States, the Supreme Court refers to Judge Bradley's opinion with approval. This is the case to which I have already referred briefly. The State of New Jersey had passed a law forbidding the building of any bridge between New Jersey and Staten Island. The State of New Jersey had all the rights of the old English sovereigns in the bed of the stream—the ground under the water—the same as in the Florida case. Congress granted the right to build a bridge across the water between New Jersey and Staten Island, and an attempt was made to enjoin the bridge company on the ground that the State of New Jersey had passed a statute forbidding the building of any bridge there, and also because in the location of the bridge piers the foundations would be placed under water upon this land which belonged to the State of New Jersey. Justice Bradley decided against both contentions; and this is the syllabus as regards the right to build the bridge:

The power of Congress in this respect—

That is, to authorize the building of bridges in such cases—being supreme, and the act in plain terms granting authority to build the bridge, the privilege is not promissory in its character, and may be exercised without the consent or concurrence of the State in which the structure is authorized by the act to be placed.

Again, as regards the land under water:

The shore and lands under water in the navigable streams and waters of New Jersey, which, prior to the Revolution, belonged to the King of Great Britain, as part of the jura regalia of the crown, passed to the State at the close of that war—

Now, here is the principle—

but the State succeeded to them as trustee of the people at large, and, the right of the State therein not being such property as is susceptible of pecuniary compensation, it is not "private property," within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, amendment 5, providing that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

I should hesitate a long while to agree to the contention that the State has a fee-simple title in those States in which the bed of stream is said to belong to the State. There may be some such a rule as that under the Spanish law, but certainly not under the common law. This is perhaps something of a digression, Mr. President, but it is of interest in the discussion of this subject. Clearly no such rule would afford any objection here, because the bed of the stream has been acquired by the company which seeks the franchise.

Another general basis for these provisions is the right of the Government, or the power that grants any privilege, to impose reasonable conditions. In arguing in support of that doctrine some have sought to justify provisions which are harsh and so repugnant to the established rules of right between man and man as to make them offensive. But there can be no question but that, in the granting of such privileges as this, reasonable conditions may be imposed. For instance, when the United States authorizes a company to build a bridge across a stream it has reserved the right to control the charges for its use. The strongest case on that subject is one in the Federal Reporter, where the privilege was granted both by the Dominion of Canada or the Province of Ontario—it is immaterial which—and by the State of New York to build the International Bridge across the Niagara River.

Under the privilege granted by the Governments involved the bridge company seemed to have the broadest rights to regulate charges. The Government of the United States, through its courts, asserted the right to control those prices, though the company had the full privilege from both the Province of Ontario and the State of New York, the court stating that the bridge could not have been built there without the consent of the United States, even though it only controlled the water in common with Canada, and hence it was authorized to impose conditions. In the building of bridges the condition has often been imposed that troops and munitions of war of the United States may cross free. It is frequently conditioned that other railway companies may cross the bridge on terms to be equitably adjusted.

Of course, I should say that where the condition is imposed that other railroads may cross the proposed bridge, a further object is to prevent a multiplicity of bridges. But this all arises from the power of the Government when granting a privilege to impose reasonable conditions for the public welfare.

Two cases are quoted in support of this doctrine, which, while they apply, I would not altogether rely upon in support of the right to impose conditions. In the State of Wisconsin a certain insurance company was doing business. It had numerous agencies and had expended a considerable amount of money for establishing its business there. The State passed a law to the effect that no foreign insurance company doing business within its borders should remove a case to the United States court.

The company was sued in the State court, and sought to remove the case to the United States court. Although it is not a substantial or essential part of the case, as I recall it, the suit was prosecuted to judgment in the State court, and then was appealed to the United States Supreme Court. In any event, the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the right of the insurance company, notwithstanding it had accepted the condition that it would not remove its case to the United States court, to resort to the Federal tribunal, and based its decision on the ground that no man can barter away his constitutional rights; that in case there is a difference of residence every man has the right to resort to the United States court, and that even if he signs an agreement to the effect that he will not avail himself of the privilege, he does not disable himself from doing so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is on the ground of public policy.

Mr. BURTON. Yes. There was another development in the controversy, however. The State thereupon peremptorily revoked the right of the company to do business in the State of Wisconsin. The Supreme Court of the United States, upon consideration of the case, sustained the right of the State of Wisconsin to revoke the license of the company to do business, notwithstanding the company had simply availed itself of a privilege of which the court asserted it could not divest itself. That case is reported in Ninety-fourth United States. On reconsideration of the same question in Two hundred and second United States, in a similar case, the case of Insurance Company against Prewitt, the Supreme Court recently held, two judges dissenting, that where a rule was laid down that if a nonresident insurance company removed its case to the United States courts its license should be revoked, it could resort to the United States court, but the State could, however, revoke its license.

There are numerous cases on this subject, and I think it will be admitted as a principle of elementary law that when a corporation or an individual takes advantage of a privilege granted in a franchise and obtains a benefit therefrom it is estopped from refusing to comply with the conditions imposed. Another case on this subject is one in which a large claim of the State of Maryland against the United States was in question. An attorney or attorneys were employed to prosecute that claim. Congress passed an act appropriating $375,000, I believe, for the payment of the claim, but imposed as a condition of its payment that no part of it should be paid to any attorney. What the object was it is unnecessary to state. Very likely it was intended to discourage the prosecution of claims against the Government, but that condition was contained in the appropriation. It went to the Supreme Court of the United States eventually, and was decided in the case of Wailes v. Smith (156 U. S., p. 271), in an opinion rendered by Mr. Justice White before he was appointed Chief Justice, in which it was held that the money having been accepted under an act that imposed that condition no one could collect any attorney's fees from the amount that was to be paid.

In this connection, Senators, I want to call attention a little further to what I have already said in regard to reports of committees in this body. I made the statement that a bill relating to the Black Warrior River contained a provision that compensation was to be paid to the United States. That was in contradiction of the statement in the minority report. The minority report very boldly contradicted the statement of the majority report. This is the quotation:

A majority of the committee in their report say:

"It appears to be a settled question that the Federal Government may impose a charge for the use of the surplus water not needed for navigation."

We, the minority, deny that this question has been settled, and we challenge the majority to point to a single law on the statute books, or to a report of a single committee in Congress, or to a single decision of the Supreme Court which tends to establish their contention.

I think I cited a sufficient number of instances the other day, but I want to refer to this special case, because it is in the State of Alabama, and the statement which I made on Wednesday was denied by the Senator from Alabama. I could have made the statement even stronger than I did. The very bill, as introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama, Senate bill 943, April 13, 1911, contained, on page 4, these conditions:

Provided, That the company—

The company was the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. They sought the privilege of using the surplus power—

Provided, That the company shall furnish, free of charge to the Government, at Locks 16 and 17, all power necessary for the operation of said locks, gates, and valves, and for the lighting of the Government stations and houses situated at said locks. And the said contract shall further provide for the payment by the company to the Government of an annual rental for its use of the water power at Dams and Locks 16 and 17 at the rate of $1 per annum per horsepower realized and developed from the water wheels delivering a minimum of not less than 80 per cent of the theoretical horsepower from the natural flowage of the river.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he thinks the Connecticut River dam bill, which we are now considering, is at all parallel to the case of the Black Warrior River dam bill?

Mr. BURTON. It is in the matter of imposing a charge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. BURTON. Quite decidedly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Government of the United States is building the lock and dam at Lock 17, on the Black Warrior River. It is the riparian owner. It owns all the property in connection with it. In this case there are private owners.

Mr. BURTON. In which case—the case of the Connecticut River?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The case of the Connecticut River. Private owners own the property. Private owners are building the dam. What the minority of the committee intended in this assertion was that no report, no bill, no law, no decision of the Supreme Court had ever recognized the right or the policy of imposing this tax—because it is a tax, and nothing more than a tax—upon a corporation situated as this corporation is in Connecticut, where they are the owners of the property, where they undertake to construct all the works in connection therewith. That is what the minority of the committee intended when it said that no report, no law, no decision of the Supreme Court had authorized any such contention; and we maintain that proposition to this moment. There is no comparison or parallel between the cases the Senator from Ohio has cited and this case of the Connecticut River dam. They are not in the same class at all.

Mr. BURTON. In the first place, Mr. President, I have quoted, and there will be inserted in my remarks——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Excuse me one minute further. I happened to be away from the Senate when this bill introduced by my colleague was passed, and I had overlooked it. It had entirely escaped my notice. The Senator from Ohio was correct in stating the provisions of that bill. I overlooked it, and to that extent we were in error in the statement in the minority report. But, Mr. President, all that provision of the bill authorizing the toll or levying a tax was stricken out of the bill here in the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, the Senator from Alabama is again in error in regard to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I mean when the conference report came in; that is when it was stricken out.

Mr. BURTON. When the conference report came in these provisions for compensation and, in fact, all of them had been so modified in the House; they had so piled Ossa on Pelion that the parties felt they could not accept it, and the whole idea of leasing it to a private party at all was abandoned. They were not satisfied in the House with the mere reservation of compensation. They wanted a number of other things.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that if I had been in the Senate when this bill was reported and passed, I should have made the same objection to it that I am making now to the Connecticut River bill.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator from Alabama, now that he is on his feet, if he had anything to do with the franchise to the Ragland Power Co., included in the river and harbor act of 1911?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, that is another exactly parallel case. The Government owned the site, and the Government built the lock and dam.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, did it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why, of course it did. All the Ragland Power Co. does is to receive authority to put on a flashboard and make, perhaps, some addition to the height of the dam, so as to create a conduit.

Mr. BURTON. I will ask the Senator from Alabama again, while he is on his feet, if it is not a fact that in his report he agrees to this bill in its entirety except two provisions, and recommends that with the striking out of those two provisions the bills do pass?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. That is to say, the Senator is in favor of it, except the provision against assignment, and the provision providing for the levying of a charge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to it if it satisfies the people of Connecticut.

Mr. BURTON. With those two provisions out, the Senator agrees to the bill? He is in favor of it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should not vote against the bill if they were out. I do not pretend to say that I approve all the provisions of the bill; but with those provisions stricken out I should not resist its passage.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I went over this subject very fully a few days ago——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Kindly allow me to treat of this matter first. Then where does the argument of the Senator from Alabama lead him? It leads him to the conclusion that if the Government builds a dam it may charge for the surplus water.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, Mr. President; I never have admitted that and I do not admit it now. What I do say is that if the Government builds the dam and the lock and creates power and surplus water, and the corporation wants to use it, the Government might say: "We have built this lock at large expense, and if you will pay us a certain percentage on our investment for the use of the structure you may use it." But I never have agreed that you could charge directly for the use of the water, because the Government does not own the water. It has no control over the water; it has no interest in it except for navigation. I doubt whether the Government could go into the courts and collect the charge that it might levy even where it had built the structure.

Mr. BURTON. What is it that the company developing the power is utilizing? It is not bricks and mortar in the dam. It is the use of the water, flowing water. What is it that the company is paying for? It is the use of the water. It seems to me a decided departure from the actual facts of the case to say that the person who has the privilege is not paying for the use of the water. What else is he paying for?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will answer the Senator. He is paying for the structure, the cost of the structure; and without the structure, of course, there would be no power.

Mr. BURTON. Why do you not appraise the structure, then, and pay for it in that form?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection in the world to the Government charging a fair percentage for the use of this structure, if they want to do it. It is a matter of contract, and if the power company does not want to accept it, it need not do it.

Mr. BURTON. Then why is it that in every bill on this subject the basis for compensation is an appraisement not of the value of the structure, not of any work which stands out tangibly there, but of the water power that is created?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is exactly what I am objecting to in this bill—the appraisement of the water power.

Mr. BURTON. Further than that, the Senator from Alabama says he does not object to this bill when these provisions are taken out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I did not say that either. I said I would not carry my objection to the extent of voting against the bill if the gentlemen up there who are directly interested in it want to accept it.

Mr. BURTON. This is what was said in the minority report, on page 4:

> We recommend the passage of the bill with the amendments suggested.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. That is about as strong a statement as you can have. Those two amendments are, first, the provision against assignment without the consent of the Secretary of War or a court of competent jurisdiction; second, the provision for imposing a certain charge.

Let us see just what this bill is. I shall have to repeat what I said day before yesterday. The bill demands of the parties that they shall build the dam at their own expense. It demands that they shall build a lock and transfer that lock to the Government free of cost. It demands that they shall acquire all the flowage rights and save the Government harmless from any damage. It requires that they shall furnish to the Government permanently electrical power for the operation of the locks and for facilitating the passage of boats.

How can you draw any line between those requirements for construction, which is exceedingly expensive, and a provision that they shall pay a certain amount for the developed water power? Here all these conditions are imposed. Some of them may be said to be in the past, such as the building; others in the future, such as the furnishing of power for the operation of the locks and this annual rental which is to be paid.

Mr. President, there is not a particle of difference in principle between the two. It all rests upon the right to impose conditions and charges, to compel the grantee or licensee to bear certain burdens as the condition of his obtaining the right. Indeed, the last charge is the fairest of them all, and I will tell you why, Mr. President:

When you build the dam, it is in some degree an experiment as to what power you can develop. When you build the lock, it is not for the use of the water-power company at all. It is for the use of navigation, pure and simple. But when you know how much water power you are going to develop and whether the enterprise is profitable or not, that is the proper time for the Government to impose a charge—where actual results are achieved by the completion of the works and placing them in operation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I shall not ask the Senator to yield to me unless he feels quite willing, but I should like to ask him a question for my own information.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A moment ago the Senator was speaking about the so-called Black Warrior bill. As I recall the terms of that bill the Government of the United States in reality was building the works in aid of navigation. Am I correct about that?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the case of the Connecticut River bill, on the other hand, the Government is not building the works in aid of navigation.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, yes; those are the only terms on which it has anything to do with it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the Government of the United States in that case is overseeing the building of a dam for private purposes in order that navigation may not be interfered with, and as it seems to me there is a very clear distinction between the two classes of cases.

Mr. BURTON. Not at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will bear with me, in the Black Warrior case the Government of the United States, in pursuance of an undoubted power under the Constitution—namely, the power to regulate commerce—is constructing works to improve the navigability of a stream. Having in pursuance of its undoubted power constructed a dam or other works, it has incidentally created property. True, it is property that was potentially in the stream to begin with, but it had no practical existence until the dam was constructed which raised the level of the water. By raising the level of the water it created a property which belonged to somebody. As it seems to me, the Government which created it, the Government of the United States, would have the same right to sell that property or to dispose of it that it would have to sell supplies that it had acquired for the use of the Army and the Navy and that were no longer required for those particular purposes.

In the case of the Connecticut River bill, that condition of things does not exist. The Government permits the construction of this dam, but the dam belongs to the private owner; and when, by raising the level of the water, power is created and thus property is created, the property belongs to the owner of the dam. How can the Government in that case insist that the owner of this property shall pay it something?

Mr. BURTON. On the general rule that whenever anyone enjoys a privilege which he obtains from the United States compensation may be required for it.

I think the Senator from Utah does not exactly understand the situation. He speaks of the Connecticut River case as one where the Government is overseeing the construction of works for the purpose of preventing obstacles to navigation. That is not the case at all. The lock and dam are just as much required in the Connecticut River as they are in the Black Warrior River, and probably would minister to a very considerably greater traffic. It is a situation where there are rapids 5½ miles long, cutting in two the navigable portions of the river.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator why the Connecticut River Co. is constructing this dam? Is it for commercial purposes, for their own uses, in order to make profit from it, or is it to improve the navigability of the river?

Mr. BURTON. So far as their own immediate purposes are concerned, it is no doubt for commercial purposes, although the company was organized in 1824 and has enjoyed a charter since then for navigation. That was the original object of the company—the promotion of navigation in the Connecticut River. Now, what is the difference? Here is a navigable stream. Would the Senator from Utah say that as a condition of allowing the construction of a dam in a navigable stream Congress may not impose the restriction that they must build with that dam a lock as well, so that boats can pass through it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly Congress may do that. That is to prevent the obstruction of the navigability of the river.

Mr. BURTON. What good does that lock do to the licensee? What is that except the exercise of the authority of the Government in imposing a restriction or condition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does the licensee no good whatever.

Mr. BURTON. In this case it costs him $470,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the power of the Government, as I understand, is to preserve the navigability of the stream.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When any citizen undertakes to interfere with the stream, the power of the Government is to see that the conditions are such that he does not interfere with the navigability of that stream. When the Government has imposed that condition and has required the construction of the dam or other structure in such a way that navigability is preserved, its power has ended. As I understand, it has not any power to do anything except either affirmatively to improve the navigability of the stream or negatively to prevent the destruction of its navigability.

Mr. THOMAS. Or injury to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. Having done that, its constitutional power has ended; and it has no business to say, in addition to the condition that the navigability shall not be interfered with or injured or destroyed, that as a consideration for its permission to construct the dam in a certain way it shall pay the Government a certain amount.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose the Government, instead of asking these parties to do this, had said, "We will build the lock, and we will charge you $470,000 for it." Would that have been a proper exercise of Federal power?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will ask the Senator to repeat that question. I did not quite catch it.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose the Government, instead of imposing upon this licensee the obligation of building the lock, had concluded to build the lock itself and had said to the licensee, "We will let you put in the dam there, but we will charge you $470,000 for the privilege." Would that have been an illegal exercise of power?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator mean the Government should say, "Instead of permitting you to build it, we will build it for you and we will charge you what it costs"?

Mr. BURTON. It is not building it for them at all. It is of no interest to them. It is of interest only to the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is building it for them, because the Government has imposed the condition upon them that it shall be built in order to preserve the rights of the Government.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose $470,000 is estimated as the cost of the lock. The Government says we are going to build it and charge you $470,000 for it. Would that be an illegal requirement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the cost of what the Government has done.

Mr. BURTON. The cost of what the Government is going to do—could that be charged as a condition for the privilege of building the dam?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And what the Government has done inures to the benefit of the private company, because, if the Government were not to do it, the private individual would be compelled to do it.

Mr. BURTON. The private individual would not be compelled to do it at all except to promote navigation there and furnish a way of getting through.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Government of the United States imposes this condition in order to preserve the navigability of the stream.

Mr. BURTON. Let me ask the Senator from Utah another question. Suppose the stream has to be improved above and below this dam and can not be made navigable except by dredging. This licensee comes and seeks a very valuable privilege there. Does the Senator from Utah maintain that the Government would be debarred from imposing upon that licensee the duty of improving the river both above and below the dam to make it navigable?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Utah simply says that the only power of the Government in connection with a matter of that kind is to insist that the structures in navigable streams shall be constructed in such a way as not to interfere with or destroy or injure navigability. If what the Senator from Ohio now suggests to be done is necessary for that purpose it may be required.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose it has no connection whatever with the construction of the dam, but there is a place both above and below, and we want to make it navigable, could the Government impose no condition so that the licensees must make a contribution to improve the approaches to that dam?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would the Senator add to that that the erection of the dam has imposed an obstruction and in part destroyed the navigability?

Mr. BURTON. This is not that case. There, I think, is the fundamental error of the Senator from Utah. It is not an error, but we do not exactly understand each other. This is not preventing obstruction to navigation. It is creating navigation. Here are considerable rapids over which you can not go unless there is a means of passing from a higher to a lower level and from a lower and higher level as well. Some one observes a very valuable water power there. The Government says to him: "We will impose on you as a condition of enjoying it that you help out in the improvement of the navigation of that river."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator mean to impose a tax to help the navigability of the river in a way that has not been affected by the structure which the company puts up for its own purposes?

Mr. BURTON. You can not separate that structure from the rest of the stream, because it creates an integral part of the navigation of the whole river.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, that, to my mind, is the whole question. If the construction of the dam interferes in any way with the navigability of the river, the Government of the United States may require the private company as a condition to putting up a dam to construct other works, if they are necessary, to restore the navigable condition. But if the improvement of the navigation of the river had no connection with the building of the dam, then it seems to me that the Government would have no right to do it. In other words, if the Senator will bear with me——

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Government of the United States would have no right to say to this company, "Because we grant you the privilege to build a dam at this point as a condition for that you shall go up the stream and remove obstructions to navigation which are in no manner affected by the dam which we give you permission to construct." The two must bear relation to each other.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, this is the contention. A corporation comes along with a proposal for improvement in that locality, and we say to them we shall not impose any obligation on you whatever except the mere creation of structures, although the privilege is of great value. That would lead to a system of favoritism and the loss to the public of valuable rights. What does the Senator from Utah say to this, which I mentioned a little while ago? When a bridge is built across a navigable stream and troops and munitions of war of the United States must be carried over that bridge. What does that have to do with constructing it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has nothing to do with the stream.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator maintain that such a restriction is not valid?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say frankly that I have never given any thought to the precise case to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BURTON. If that is not a valid restriction, then Congress has sinned very many times; but I think it has sinned in the line of doing something for the promotion of the public good.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator, without concluding myself upon the question, I would doubt very much whether the Government of the United States in authorizing the building of a bridge, simply that it may be built in such a way as not to interfere with navigation, could impose a condition such as the Senator suggests. I am not familiar with the legislation to which the Senator calls attention.

Mr. BURTON. The important point on which the Senator from Utah and myself differ is on the right to impose conditions in such a case as that, and what may be the nature of those conditions. I maintain the absolute right exists in such a case to impose conditions in the interest of the general welfare. That is the very price of all franchises, and we are imposing it every day.

When a privilege is exercised we may regulate the charges as we have done in regard to bridges across navigable streams, and we can compel them to share with other corporations the right to go across. Such a valuable privilege should not be given away, nor should these water powers of such enormous value to the country be granted without any quid pro quo.

Now, I want to dwell somewhat further on what was said by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator indulge me in one remark?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The powers to which the Senator calls attention are not powers controlled by or owned by the Government of the United States. That is a species of property wholly controlled by the State. The Government of the United States, therefore, in granting a right to build the dam does not grant the right to create a power; it simply permits the construction of a dam and keeps the control of that subject wholly with reference to its power over navigation and not at all with reference to the creation of a property right by the erection of the dam.

Mr. BURTON. Of course, the two go inseparably together. The Government of the United States has taken a large responsibility in the way of improving that river. I have forgotten the exact amount which it has expended; I think, perhaps, some $600,000. Here is this privilege. Those who are seeking it are willing, and indeed anxious, to accept on the terms proposed.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not a fact that the Connecticut River Co. in making application to Congress for the right which is embodied in the bill is practically using or expecting to use the Government's power to control navigation merely as an incident to an enterprise the principal object of which is to generate power for commercial purposes?

Mr. BURTON. The action of Congress is based on navigability. The aim of the company is to develop water power. The two are coordinate. One may have one object and another may have another object. Our object is to extend the navigation of the Connecticut River past those rapids at Springfield and Holyoke, a thing we have been asked to do for, lo, these 20 years, and we have not felt that we could afford the expenditure. The object here is to bring about that result, and, in bringing it about, to utilize the water.

Mr. THOMAS. But the Senator has said that this company is not only anxious but eager to submit to the conditions of the bill. It must be true, therefore, that the company is seeking to utilize the power of the Government over navigation merely as an agency to enable it to obtain a very valuable property right.

Mr. BURTON. I would not say that. I would say that this company has already certain riparian lands and it has been seeking to develop navigation and power. They wish still further to develop that power, but as a condition they must obtain the consent of the Federal Government. I do not see how they are seeking to utilize Federal power in the matter. They are coming here and ask permission to be given that without which they can do nothing. I think that differs quite materially from the statement as made by the Senator from Colorado.

A moment ago I was talking, Mr. President, about the Black Warrior bill. The first one was introduced in the Senate April 13, 1911, and it had the provision that the company shall pay to the Government a rental of $1 per annum, and beginning with the year 1920 shall pay to the Government an additional rental or royalty of 50 cents per horsepower. They are also compelled to obtain flowage rights. This case here is distinguished from the other in principle, because they are compelled not only to pay the money but they are compelled to acquire a part of that which the Government would acquire, namely, the flowage rights.

This bill was reported on the 19th of June, 1911, by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with all these provisions in it for compensation. Later the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] introduced an amendment in which he included provision for flowage rights. This bill passed the Senate the 24th of July, 1911, containing all these provisions for compensation. It went to the House and was very materially changed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but the provision for compensation was still retained. Then on the passage of the bill still further conditions were inserted.

Mr. President, there is another bill, one pertaining to the Ragland Water Power Co.—or, to be exact, a part of a river and harbor bill—which, it seems to me, comes very near to the principle enunciated in this bill. The Senator from Alabama, if I recollect aright, introduced the amendment providing for this item. It relates to Dam No. 4 in the Coosa River. The company contracts to complete the dam. Bear in mind what this is. At Lock No. 4 in the Coosa River there was an uncompleted dam, and this company came here and desired the privilege of improving that locality and developing water power. What difference is there in principle between constructing half a dam and constructing the whole of it?

In the very bill which the Senator from Alabama introduced the company contracts to complete the dam, furnish all materials and labor, and convey the same to the Federal Government free of cost, claims, or any charges whatsoever—that is, an incomplete dam was to be finished.

They agreed to complete the work within three years.

To fully safeguard the interests of navigation, under such provisions for the operation of the dam and lock as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

To furnish to the United States free of cost electric current for operating and lighting the property.

To execute a bond for the faithful fulfillment of the contract.

To pay the cost of Government inspection.

To submit to any change in the specifications that the Secretary of War may make.

Here is another agreement that is a part of the construction:

To raise the height of the dam 3 feet and stop all leaks in the Government work already constructed.

To pay all damages to riparian owners for flowage rights.

To pay $1 per 10-hour horsepower year for the power due to natural flowage.

To pay from $1 to $3 for each 10-hour horsepower year produced by storage.

The Secretary of War may in his discretion readjust rates of compensation at periods of 10 years.

Having submitted to all these conditions, the company get the 50-year franchise, expressly subject to amendment or revocation, with no provision for compensation for the property.

Mr. President, the conditions here altogether surpass those in this Connecticut River bill. They are on the same plane, because in this very measure which the Senator from Alabama presented the obligation is imposed upon the licensee to finish the dam, stop all leaks in it, erect flashboards, and raise the height 3 feet. What is the difference between that and the original privilege? It is very much more severe in comparison with the franchise in this pending measure. The licensee in the Alabama bill like one who having been knocked down and kicked and cuffed around, is compelled to pay and then fight for the privilege of being thrown out of the window.

I will not repeat in full what I said day before yesterday, but I will again refer to the document to be printed herewith giving the three classes of permits under which private parties have used water. First, where the Government has already built a dam and afterwards leases it. Second, where the Government contemplates itself building a dam and makes provision for charge or compensation. Our recent river and harbor bills, beginning with 1909, including the provisions for a survey of a 14-foot waterway, provide that a report shall be made as to what will be fair in the way of compensation. In this very Connecticut case the report was made that there should be certain compensation to the Government in case structures producing water power should be built.

The third class is the one under which this bill is introduced, where the privilege to construct the lock and dam or the dam is given with conditions attached. We have passed a number of those statutes imposing all sorts of conditions. There is hardly a Senator here who has not been on the floor when bills like this one have been passed, in which the most stringent conditions are imposed in granting the right to develop water power in navigable streams.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the Senator from Ohio cite us to a single bill on all fours with this where the riparian owner constructs the dam and pays all the expenses necessary to provide for navigation? Can the Senator point to a single bill where anything is imposed except merely to operate the lock?

Mr. BURTON. There has been no case in which there has been so specific a statement as this of the amount paid.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not talking about specific amounts. I am asking the Senator if he can point to a single act upon the statute book on all fours with this, where the corporation built the lock and dam at its own expense, and where they own the site, and any charge has been imposed except such as is necessary to operate the lock. That is my question.

Mr. BURTON. The Coosa Dam act provided that the licensee should finish the dam and pay a fee besides.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Government there is the owner, and it built and nearly completed it. It lacked only a little of completing it.

Mr. BURTON. I argued that at great length earlier in the discussion. There is no difference in principle in any of those impositions—the building of a dam, the building of a lock, the furnishing of power—from that involved in this case. They all rest on one principle, the right of the Government, when it is improving navigation and finds valuable water power, to impose conditions upon the one who is granted the privilege.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is where we part company. There is where we differ.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am conscious that I have detained the Senate longer than I had intended and necessarily have repeated the same material, but I wish to make some general remarks on the subject of conservation. We have vast potential water power that has been withheld from utilization for years past which would have been utilized if the policy embodied in this bill were adopted.

It has already been adopted in the case of Hale's bar below Chattanooga and in a half dozen other cases. It is not fair to the people of this country to ask them to improve a river where the improvement would be as expensive as that of the Connecticut and allow a water-power right there which is inseparably connected with the obstacle to navigation to go to a private individual corporation without contributing to that expense. It is especially not the right course for us to pursue when the parties appear and are willing to submit to all these conditions and the whole neighborhood is anxious to have the work done in the manner proposed.

Conservation does not mean reservation. It never did mean permanent reservation, at least in the minds of its more judicious advocates. It does mean, however, that the resources of the country, its great natural wealth, shall neither be wasted nor shall they fall into the hands of a favored few. It means that such policies should be adopted that the public domain and all its varied treasures shall be so utilized as to secure the maximum of benefit and at the same time afford the maximum equality of opportunity. It recognizes that in the past we have made serious errors in granting lands and in allowing concentrated ownership in the hands of agressive exploiters.

All this is but a part of the haste in development which is characteristic of American life and which has resulted from a lack of foresight. Neither Congress nor the executive department has fully realized the rapidity with which the possessions which are necessary for the very life of the people have been exhausted. Conservation does not mean that we of the present should be debarred from the enjoyment of the wealth which belongs to us, nor does it seek, as was stated by the deceased Senator from Colorado, Mr. Hughes, to make "mollycoddles" of those who come after us.

The experience of past ages has shown that as one class of materials is exhausted invention and new discoveries will supply substitutes. This has been true of the partial substitution of iron and steel for wood in construction, of coal for wood for domestic purposes, and may be true in the future in the substitution of concrete for iron and other material. The future generations, in the realization of objects which minister to the necessities and conveniences of life, must solve its problems as well as the present, and must face its difficulties in appropriating the forces of nature and the treasures of the earth. The policy both of President Roosevelt and President Taft, and in a less degree of their predecessors, was to reserve certain portions of the public domain. This was not with a view to their indefinite withdrawal, but was prompted by the desire to prevent land grabbers and the so-called "timber thieves" from gaining an undue share of the public lands or public property. This policy was especially prompted by a desire to keep in abeyance the distribution of the remaining portions of the public domain until Congress shall have adopted a comprehensive, rational, and just policy for the utilization of natural resources. Such a policy should place no obstacle in the way of continued development of the country, but should secure with the utmost pains the prevention of monopoly and the repression of all efforts of the strong or unscrupulous to obtain an advantage over others.

Water power, a resource of enormous value, is running to waste. I gave some figures on this subject——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURTON. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio what is the significance of the remark that water power is running to waste?

Mr. BURTON. Because so large a share of it is not utilized.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But does the Senator mean that water power is wasted because it is not used to-day?

Mr. BURTON. I am referring, Mr. President, to the present use. That will appear as I go on.

Over 30,000,000 primary horsepower, it is estimated, can be developed in the streams of this country. The amount already utilized is about five million and a half. The total aggregate of horsepower, generated by all kinds of prime movers, now utilized in the country is about 26,000,000, of which five and a half million is water power, and the balance chiefly steam power. There are mined 500,000,000 tons of coal annually, and a very large share of this amount might either be saved or utilized for other purposes if the water power of the country could be utilized in a proper manner.

Unlike timber or material, it is not exhaustible, but will last for all time. With more perfect means for development and utilization it will show increased efficiency and become of far greater value. If the aim of conservation, in so far as it seeks to prevent waste, does not fully apply here, the prevention of monopoly and the prevention or adequate regulation of concentrated ownership does apply with unusual force. It is of the utmost importance that the benefits of its utilization should not be regarded as the prerogative of an individual or of a corporation, not of a community or even of a sovereign State, but of a nation of nearly 100,000,000 people, whose reliance upon it in the future must be greatly increased. The problem is thus a national one. Modern progress has already made it possible to distribute electrical power from one source over an area of 125,000 square miles, an area greater than that of any of the States of the Union except three—Texas, California, and Montana. In saying all this it is not meant to convey the impression that the States are not to have very large powers in disposing of and regulating the use of water power, but by reason of the wide area over which this power may be transmitted and used the national scope of the problem becomes apparent. Like all enterprises which become interstate in character, the powers of the States may prove insufficient and control may eventually be left to the Federal Government. This is especially true when, as in the present case, the use of the power is inseparably bound up with the development of navigation. In the building of locks and dams for navigation there can be no separate control of water power without confusion and the insuperable difficulties which result from a divided control of that which should be inseparable.

Mr. President, I have sought to establish the following propositions, though, in view of the questions asked, there have been many digressions:

First, that whenever an improvement is made which promotes navigation and in such improvement, whether by locks or dams or otherwise, a water power is created, that water power is an incident to the principal fact, and it belongs to the State or Government which seeks to promote navigation. Second, that as a matter of public policy there should, in the language of the Supreme Court, be no divided empire between the two; they are inseparably bound together. The coordination of the two makes possible the development both of navigation and of water power, which otherwise would be unprofitable and in fact wasteful. Third, that contrary to the statement in the minority report, the settled policy of Congress as well as of the executive department for now nearly a quarter of a century has been to dispose of such water power, whether created by works already constructed or to be created by works owned by the Government thereafter to be constructed, or, in the third place, when created by works constructed by private companies which undertake an improvement in a navigable stream under a grant of Congress.

The right of the Government to collect compensation depends upon the fact that it has the responsibility for the improvement of navigable streams, and in carrying out plans of such improvements it may employ all means which are plainly adapted to that end and are consistent with the spirit of the Constitution.

Right in that connection I want to say that I think the proposition ought to be accepted that if the Government can go into the Connecticut River, build a dam, create water power, and sell the surplus, you can not deny that it may say, in the exercise of the right to regulate commerce and delegate that power to others, "we will give that right to construct those dams to another, and the profit which we might have derived from the building of that dam shall still remain with us, although another constructs the work."

Conditions requiring construction of dams, or of dams and locks, the acquisition of flowage rights, the furnishing of electrical power, the payment of an annual charge for the value of water power, either established by congressional enactment or left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, have been the invariable rule, without a single objection being raised in the courts.

The circumstances of this particular case are exceptional in that the proposed improvement not only extends navigation in a river where already there is a large and growing traffic, but in that the improvement is located in a busy industrial section where power can be immediately utilized to great commercial advantage. If there is any case which has come before us in which the imposition of conditions would be reasonable, it is here. It should again be noted that in this case the Federal Government is not confronted by any opposition or unwillingness either on the part of those who propose to make the improvement or those who will pay for the service.

Mr. President, I want to make a suggestion right here. Suppose you are to make it a rule that under no circumstances shall any amount be paid by one of these companies after it has developed water—that all conditions must be finished when you merely require the building of the dams and locks. Now, let us see how great the injustice would be. There might be water power in a part of the country where there was no market for its product whatever, where the mere imposition of the obligation to build a dam would be a very severe requirement. On the other hand, there might be a case, as this is, right in the midst of a busy industrial section, where the person who utilized the power could well afford to build a dam and lock, buy flowage rights, and pay a large amount besides. If you want to enforce any hard and fast rule here, just see where you would land. You would have to treat all such cases virtually alike, at least up to the finishing of the structure; you could make no distinction between a very profitable franchise and one which has little or no value. The result would be that not only the general public would suffer, but there would be very serious obstacles in the way of development.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is not the Senator from Ohio overlooking the power of the State in the matter? The State would have the authority to step in and exact, through taxation or otherwise, proper charges. Such a company would be a public-utility corporation, and the State would have the right to regulate its charges.

Mr. BURTON. In that case, however, you would have as great a variety of regulations as there are States—forty-eight. Then, again, as I have already stated, the sufficient answer to that is that this is a privilege which is granted by the National Government. The National Government, which represents the whole people and which is improving the channels of rivers for the purpose of promoting navigation, in improving those rivers ought to be fair toward all localities, not paying from general taxation for an improvement that is unduly expensive in one region and giving away a right that goes with it for nothing. That is what it would lead to.

I want to say in this connection, Mr. President, that while I was connected with the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the other House I knew of cases where the building of locks and dams was advocated under the guise of improving navigation, when the real object, after the dam had been constructed, was to obtain water power. It was not merely conjecture; but it is a fact that persons made use of agitation among commercial bodies and others, who came here and advocated improvements of the most expensive nature in rivers, saying, "We want water communication," when what they really desired was water power.

On the other hand, there is the greatest earnestness on the part of all those in the locality to have this improvement made on the terms proposed in this bill, and no theoretical objection, no possible fear of establishing a precedent should be allowed to defeat the plainly expressed desire of the people of Connecticut and Massachusetts, who so manifestly wish that this bill should pass. It is necessary, Senators, that we should look at this matter from a broad national standpoint. The doctrine of State rights should be a shield, not a sword; we should not stand in the way of the development of the country. We must recognize that States and communities can not control this problem as well as the National Government.

I do not say that of every case. I do say this, however, if I may digress just a moment, that there is no line of industrial activity in which there are so many reasons for consolidation as in the case of the production of water power; and in the future I think this is inevitable. In the first place, a single water power may supply a very large area. In the next place, in one part of the country, in one watershed, the supply may be abundant at one time but slack at another time, and it is very desirable that they should tie up plants located on different watersheds so that one may aid and, as it were, piece out the other. Again, there is no business in which the advantages of economies can be better secured than in the case of the development and utilization of water power. So probably more and more these different water-power sites will be utilized together. I should look with the utmost apprehension upon their control by any one great corporation or organization or, indeed, upon consolidation in any form, unless the most careful regulation went with it. By reason, first, of the fact that in some instances a single water power will supply more than one State, and, second, that the advantages and economies of combination are so great—for these two reasons the national control is likely to be more and more asserted. The problem is assuming greater proportions than ever before, and in the future water power must be one of the chief assets not of any particular locality but of the Nation. I appeal to the Senators to pass this bill in the form in which it has been introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. THORNTON. Before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat I wish to ask a question that I would not ask before, because I did not wish to interrupot his argument, in spite of his well-known willingness to submit to interruptions. Twice during his argument he said that the grantee in this case was perfectly willing to accept the conditions imposed by the grantor, which is the Government of the United States. The inference that I drew from that was that that being the case, the Senate should not object. Does the Senator from Ohio take the position that because the grantee—the corporation—is perfectly willing and anxious, even, to accept a condition imposed by the Government, a Senator who should believe that the Government in imposing such condition is transcending its powers or possibly usurping the powers that belong to the State should not object to the passage of the bill?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; by no means. I presume I did not make myself altogether clear to the Senator from Louisiana. Of course, the franchise they would have liked would not have contained the conditions this contains; but after long consultation they have consented to this, and they are now anxious to have it carried through.

Mr. THORNTON. Yes; Mr. President, I thoroughly understand that the corporation is anxious; but the question I asked was, Does the Senator say that because of that reason a Senator should not object?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; not at all. It is because the people who are in the locality desire it most earnestly; and this corporation has been found, which is willing to carry on the work.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator a question along that line.

Mr. BURTON. Very well.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that when that corporation came here to seek this franchise they were told, "Unless you accept this provision your bill will be vetoed"?

Mr. BURTON. I do not know what was stated to them, but I presume that is a fact.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no doubt about that being the fact.

Mr. BURTON. Perhaps there was something in the form of a prior veto of a bill relative to the Coosa River.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, Mr. President, I desire to ask the Secretary to read a short paragraph from the report——

Mr. BURTON. From what page does the Senator ask the Secretary to read?

Mr. BANKHEAD. From page 86 of the final report of the National Waterways Commission, signed by the Senator from Ohio as chairman. It is interesting reading in connection with this discussion. I ask the Secretary to read the portion I have marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The commission is of the opinion that the Federal Government has no proprietary right or interest in navigable waters which would authorize the collection of tolls. The right, if it exists at all, rests upon either the second or third theory stated. As regards the second theory, it should be said that the imposition of tolls, unless based upon a more substantial foundation than the mere authority to grant or withhold consent—an authority arising solely from the control of the Federal Government for the purposes of navigation—does not commend itself to the commission, and it is to be doubted whether, even in case a bill should be passed or other action taken by Congress for granting this permission, with a provision for charging tolls, such tolls could be collected. Regarding the third theory stated, it should be noted that under the exercise of the taxing power Congress can levy taxes for general revenue purposes upon all classes of water power, whether in navigable or nonnavigable streams, and if charges are to be imposed it would seem that this is the normal method. It should further be borne in mind that a requirement for the imposition of tolls where the right to construct dams is hereafter granted would cause a discrimination between water power to be utilized under future permits and those already enjoyed, which are subject to no such charge. It must, of course, be remembered that whenever the privilege of constructing dams is granted in a navigable stream there is an undoubted right to impose charges sufficient to pay the expenses of examination and supervision and to secure the Government against cost by reason of obstacles to navigation created by the erection of dams; but this rests upon an entirely different principle from the proposal to charge tolls.

Mr. BURTON. I do not deny, Mr. President, that I have in some degree changed my mind during the last three years about this matter. I was chairman of that commission, and the magnitude of this problem in connection with the proper method of utilization has very much grown upon me since that report was signed. It should be borne in mind that the whole report should be taken together.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, before the Senator from Ohio finally concludes, he has given such a clear statement of his views upon the matter that I hesitate to ask him any of the questions I have in mind, but I think they go to the foundation of this whole question.

Mr. BURTON. I will be very glad to answer the Senator, if I can.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, the Senator understands that the Senate is not now really considering the question of the Connecticut River Co., but the Senate is considering a proposition as to the relative rights of individuals, the States, and the General Government in this basic proposition. I want to ask the Senator, in his opinion, who, if anyone, owns the water in the Connecticut River?

Mr. BURTON. Is that the question?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have three questions which I desire to ask, that being the first. The second is, Who, if anyone, owns the land under the water in the Connecticut River? The third one is, Whether or not, if the Government can dispose of the power generated at this dam, it can use it for any purpose which it chooses? I will make a little further explanation of that. If the Government can dispose of this water for a fixed charge for the purpose of running a manufacturing plant, can the Government itself run a manufacturing plant; or, if the Government can dispose of this power to a company for the purpose of running a trolley line, can the Government itself also use that power for running a trolley line? Those are the questions upon which I want to get the views of the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have already dealt at considerable length upon the first two of those questions. Who owns the water? It is not the property of anyone. We say in a vague way it is the property of the public; but, save for three rights, it is as free as light or air.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. The first right is the right of the owner of the bed of the stream——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I want to say to him that my purpose in asking these questions and getting his views is that they might perhaps form the basis of future discussion upon this or other bills.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Idaho will kindly let me answer these questions I will yield to him later. The right of the owner to the bed of the stream is not an unqualified right. In some States it belongs to the State; in others the abutting proprietor owns to the center of the stream; sometimes his property is bounded by the low-water mark and sometimes by the high-water mark.

Now, if the bed of the stream belongs to the State, it must be utilized for a public purpose. I think there is a considerable difference in the States as to just what right inheres in the ownership of the bed of the stream. I should question whether in any State it went as far as a fee-simple right, so that the Commonwealth could sell it out to a private individual for such purposes as that individual desired to use it—to part with the title, and thereby deprive the public of the use of it.

The second right in that water, which is a qualification of its free use, is the riparian right in its flow, which involves its reasonable beneficial use, provided it does not interfere with the rights of riparians above or below. The third right is that of navigation, the control of which belongs to the Government of the United States, and is a right paramount to all. In the Western States there is a very different rule in regard to water. I am only speaking of the Eastern States. The Senator from Wyoming is no doubt very much better informed with respect to the conditions in the Western States than I am. There different conditions arising from the business of mining and the demands of agriculture necessarily make water a much more valuable asset than it is here in the East, and, in fact, generally speaking, the supply in the West is much scarcer than it is in the East.

As to surplus water available for power, can the Government use it for its own purposes? Why, yes; if it is for the carrying on of any public purpose and is connected with navigation. For instance, if there should be an armory or an arsenal where power was required, and there should be a Government work constructed there for the sake of navigation, and surplus power was created, I have no doubt that that water could be used for turning the lathes in that armory or arsenal; but, as a general proposition, I should say "no." If the Government is operating a trolley to carry its men from one portion of a navy yard or one portion of a camp to another, surplus water power above that required for navigation could be applied as a propelling power for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think probably there is no question about that in either the Senator's mind or in my own.

Mr. BURTON. I was going to say one thing further a little in the line of the question asked by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a few days ago. If there is surplus water in a navigable stream and a plant is erected to utilize that surplus water for running locks, and there is more than is required for running the locks, I am inclined to think the Government could dispose of the surplus.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, my question was—and it seems to me as though the greater would involve the less—if the Government has authority for hire to dispose of, as under the terms of this bill, the power that is generated, could it itself use it along the same lines in which it is used by the lessee or the grantee?

Mr. BURTON. Maybe it could. It could sell the surplus water. The Senator's question is, Could it build a hydroelectric plant and sell the power?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly so. That is my question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Or hitch it to machinery and sell the product of a factory?

Mr. BURTON. That is a different thing; that goes further. I never like to express an opinion on a question of this kind.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was seeking to find out just where the Senator's most clear and logical argument might lead us.

Mr. BURTON. I would be inclined not to favor any proposition that went that far; but the question of whether in their ownership of surplus power, the Government can not devise means to dispose of that surplus power in a profitable manner is a different matter.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BURTON. I believe the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] first rose.

Mr. BORAH. I was not desirous of interrupting the Senator; I thought the Senator had concluded; and I had some matters of legislation I wanted to bring up.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he regards the dam which the grantee in this case proposes to erect as a structure belonging to navigation?

Mr. BURTON. I should say it was a structure erected in aid of navigation; yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a structure that the Nation itself could build in aid of interstate commerce?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And it is a structure the use of which for other purposes the Nation, if it constructed it, could turn over to others for a consideration, is it not?

Mr. BURTON. Well, that would depend somewhat on the purpose to which it was to be applied.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well, take this case: If this structure, created in aid of navigation, is capable of a use which will result in the development of water power, can the United States Government, as a means of lessening the cost of that navigation, get profit from that use?

Mr. BURTON. I would say it could get an income from the surplus power. I do not know that I understood the question of the Senator from Nevada. I understood him to ask if it could sell the structure of the dam.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state very briefly, then, my contention, which is entirely in harmony, I believe, with that of the Senator from Ohio; but I have not been here this afternoon and have not had the advantage of the Senator's argument. As I understand, the Senator's contention is that this dam is constructed in aid of navigation?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is, the Nation itself, under the interstate commerce power, could construct it?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And that, having constructed it, it could allow that structure to be put to some other profitable use which would diminish, of course, to the Nation, the cost of the enterprise in aid of navigation?

Mr. BURTON. Not unless that other use was in conjunction with its use for navigation. For instance, if a dam and lock were constructed in a stream which it was intended to abandon for navigation, the Government would have the right to sell the structure, but it could not sell the right to utilize the water power with it. When the Federal purpose for which it was constructed ceases, then the incidental purpose of the development of water power would cease with it. The best illustration is the one I gave about the building of a market house, having an auditorium above it. When its use as a market house is abandoned the municipality was held not to have the right to maintain an auditorium.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded his remarks, I should like to say a few words upon that subject.

Mr. BURTON. I am through.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, my view of this matter, based simply upon a casual study of it, is that the structure in question may be regarded as a structure in aid of navigation, and therefore it can be erected by the National Government under the power to regulate commerce between the States. It is a dam which is intended to raise the height of the stream above the dam in such a way as to prevent the rapids from impeding navigation. The purpose is to create a pool behind this dam, through which ships and vessels can proceed to the upper reaches of the river, and for that purpose locks are put at the side of the dam, with a view to enabling vessels to be raised or lowered, as occasion may require, in order to go up or down the river.

The National Government has the right to make that structure for that purpose, and in making it it necessarily creates a head of water which can be put to a profitable use in the development of power.

Doubtless the National Government itself, having constructed this structure, can make use of that structure in such a way as to develop this power. It does not claim, necessarily, any property right in the water. That is an elusive thing, as elusive as air itself, slipping from the upper reaches of the river down into the lower reaches and thence into the sound. It therefore may possibly have no property right in the water, but it has a property right in the structure, and the passage of that water over or through the structure creates a power of which the National Government is necessarily the owner.

Being the owner of that power, the National Government can part with it; and it would be a wise thing for it to part with it in a profitable way, for by so doing it would diminish the cost of the structure for purposes of navigation, and thus make feasible a navigation enterprise which otherwise would be entirely unfeasible because of the cost.

Having that power, the National Government can select an agent for the execution of that power. It can select an agent and authorize that agent to do what it can do—obstruct the stream by a dam for the purposes of navigation and construct the locks essential to navigation. The agent will then be in the same position as the principal, in the possession of a dam useful for two purposes—the promotion of navigation and the development of water power.

If, then, the principal has the power to select an agent to create a structure which the principal can construct, and if the principal has the right to every profitable use of that structure if it constructs it itself, it can make terms with the agent with reference to the compensation which the principal shall receive for the exercise by the agent of a privilege which it could not exercise at all without the license of the principal, particularly when that compensation is to be expended in the regulation of the river itself, a regulation essential to navigation and power development.

So, Mr. President, this legislation does not involve in any degree the ownership of water. Water flowing in a stream is no more the subject of ownership than a bird flying in the air. Reduce the bird to possession and it is your property, but so long as it flies in the air it is not. So it is with the water; reduce it to absolute possession, put it in a pail, and it is yours; but so long as it flows from its source to the Sound, subject only to temporary artificial obstructions, it is not the property of anyone.

In this case the Government deals simply with the structure and the use of the structure; not with the water or the use of the water. Having the right to rear the structure, and having the right also to select an agent to rear that structure, it can in law attach any condition it chooses to the use by that agent of the structure which it creates.

Mr. President, this illustrates the kind of legislation with which the Congress of the United States has been amusing itself for a hundred years or more regarding our navigable rivers. I say "amusing itself," for our legislation has lacked effectiveness, lacked efficiency. We have been trifling with this great question of the development of our rivers, and we have been trifling while we have been engaging in the Senate and in the House in endless discussion over the respective powers, rights, and jurisdictions of the Nation and of the States.

The Connecticut River furnishes an illustration of the futility of our efforts to reach any comprehensive results. That river affects the interests of four or five States. Taking its source in Vermont and New Hampshire, it proceeds through Massachusetts and Connecticut into Long Island Sound. It is useful for two purposes there only. It is probably not useful for irrigation, as our western streams are, because of the humidity of the climate.

It is not, perhaps, to be regulated as many of our southern rivers are, in the interest of the reclamation of our swamp lands. The uses which are to be regulated on that river are the uses of its waters for navigation and the development of water power. That river is subject to the jurisdiction of four State sovereignties and one national sovereignty, the jurisdiction of each being clear and distinct, but each of these sovereignties having an interest in the river. It never has occurred to Congress, apparently, so far as action is concerned, although many of us have been debating it for years, that it would be a wise thing for these sovereigns, each having an interest in this river, to get together, confer through representatives with each other, and agree upon comprehensive plans under which each sovereign can itself or through agents do the part that belongs to its jurisdiction, so that the works will dovetail into each other and thus bring about the highest efficiency of the river itself for every purpose of civilization.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I only want to speak for a few moments.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just at that point I wanted to ask a question of the Senator, but I will not do it if he prefers that I should not. It is right on that particular line.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will answer the question, then.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator was speaking of an agreement between the States themselves and the General Government. I should like to ask the Senator if any agreement could be made that would add to or take from the rights which the States and the General Government would have before that agreement was entered into?

Mr. NEWLANDS. None whatever; and I was careful to say that these plans would involve simply the exercise of the jurisdiction that belongs to each sovereign, and that each would accomplish its work within its jurisdiction, but under plans that would enable their works to dovetail with each other in such a way as to create the highest efficiency of the river for the uses of civilization.

We have no ambassadors, no ministers plenipotentiary, which the Nation can send to the States in order to confer with them regarding matters of joint interest. But will it be contended for a moment that no machinery can be created by which the Nation can talk to the States and the States can talk to the Nation, and that no machinery can be created by which each will exercise its admitted jurisdiction in such a way as to benefit instead of injuring the other? That is what we require—that simple machinery, through a national board meeting with boards appointed by the respective States, and, with the aid of engineers and experts, formulating plans which will permit of the harmonious and complete and comprehensive development of the waterways of the country without impairing in any degree the jurisdiction or the powers of each sovereign.

The Senator from Ohio—and I am sorry he is not here—served with me some years ago on an inland waterway commission created by President Roosevelt in the exercise of his power of recommendation to Congress, without statutory authority. On that commission we served with men distinguished in engineering and otherwise, with a view to presenting a plan under which the Nation and the States could coordinate in this great work. We made a report covering every contention which I have made, and Congress turned aside from the report. A bill which I had reported from the Committee on Commerce embracing the essentials was sandbagged on the floor of the Senate by the representatives of both parties, two of those representatives being from the Southern States, the section which will be more developed by this method of treatment than any other section of the country. Ever since then some of us have been making strenuous efforts, in committee and upon the floor of the Senate, to have this simple process of accommodation between the sovereigns accomplished through legislation. Thus far our efforts have been unavailing.

It is often said that some of us are 10 years ahead of our time. The trouble is that Congress is 10 years behind the times. This is demonstrated by the action of every waterway convention that has met in the country of late years, by the declarations of commercial bodies throughout the country, all of which have declared for cooperation between the Nation and the States in this important work, and by the declarations of the political parties of the country, all of which in the last campaign and, I think, all of them in the preceding campaign have demanded most emphatically the cooperation and the coordination of the Nation and the States in these important works.

Mr. President, I referred to the action of the Inland Waterways Commission. I was impatient to end the work of that commission, because it was a commission of legislative deliberation, and I wished to substitute a commission of action. When that report was presented to Congress, what did it do? It organized another commission—not of action, but of deliberation—the National Waterways Commission, of which my friend the Senator from Ohio was the chairman. It sat for two or three years upon these questions, and finally presented findings almost identical with those established by the Inland Waterways Commission organized by President Roosevelt, and of which my friend the honored Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] was one of the members.

So we have been wasting years in deliberation, meanwhile permitting this old spoils system, this patronage system of developing our waterways, to continue, under which individual Senators and individual Congressmen have been accustomed to present to Congress projects for individual constructions and individual dredgings here and there, and then bear back to their constituencies the evidence of their triumphant efforts—triumphant only in inefficiency; triumphant only in the careless expenditure of public money without adequate plans.

Mr. President, this is another of these cases of sporadic legislation regarding our waterways. Fortunately, it can be commended much more highly than the individual and scattered projects that usually present themselves, for it is an intelligent conception regarding a river of rather limited length, and whose uses have been well ascertained. The problem has been well thought out. I am disposed to support this bill, not because I like these individual cases of legislation when we ought to engage in general legislation involving all the waterways of the country, but because I think it has a merit; because I do not think it means simply the prestige of the individual Congressman or the individual Senator; because I do not believe it is a part of the spoils system which has prevailed in this country in projects both on our rivers and in our public buildings, just as it has existed in office.

I should much prefer if in this bill we would organize a commission of engineers, and authorize that commission to meet with similar commissions from the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, and have them work out broad, comprehensive plans relating to the full development of this river for every useful purpose.

I would much prefer to have them come with such broad and comprehensive plans and indicate that this is the part which the National Government is called upon to do, and this is the part that corporations or individuals are called upon to do under the laws of Vermont or New Hampshire or Massachusetts or Connecticut, thus involving a great work of utilization of the entire river for every useful purpose.

Coming as it does, having merit as it has, I am disposed to sustain this bill. I make these few remarks only with a view to calling the attention of the Senate of the United States to the fact that all the political parties have demanded that we should take up the question of waterway development in a comprehensive way; that that involves the regulation of the flow of the rivers, reducing the crest of the flood, and raising the height of the ebb flow; it involves bank protection, levee building, storage for irrigation above, intermediate storage for the development of water power, the control of the waters so as to promote the reclamation of swamp lands, every process of arresting the flood waters of the rivers as they fall from the heavens, in such a way as that they shall not within a few days or a few weeks be precipitated upon the weakest portion and perhaps the richest portion of our country and devastate its cultivable area; it involves treating the river as a highway of commerce, with terminals, transfer sites, and facilities, and facilities for coordinating with railways. In this great work we should unite under comprehensive plans the functions and powers of every sovereignty affected, and thus establish team work in the place of this eternal contention over questions of jurisdiction and sovereignty. We can thus turn every river from an instrumentality of destruction into an instrumentality of benefaction and create in every section of the country the largest prosperity and wealth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into any argument on the merits of this question at this late hour of the afternoon. As Senators know, the bill will be taken up under the unanimous-consent agreement next Tuesday, and then I may address the Senate briefly upon it. But some remarks have been made here this afternoon which lead me to put into the RECORD a short statement of what I claim is the constitutional authority of the Government to impose a condition of a money nature upon the granting of a license to construct a dam.

Most of the questions that are being discussed, it seems to me, apply to other bills and other propositions. There are many questions of a speculative and a somewhat obscure nature concerning the physical ownership of water, the ownership of the tide lands in the different States, the uses that the water can be put to for the development of electrical power, what sort of property the power generated is, and whether the Government or the State has the right to sell it, which are interesting and must be solved at some time, either, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] says, in a national policy of broad scope or by particular legislation.

I apprehend that the only part of this bill that will cause any serious discussion is the provision beginning at line 19 of page 2 of Senate bill 8033, as follows:

And provided further, That the Secretary of War, as a part of the conditions and stipulations referred to in said act, may, in his discretion, impose a reasonable annual charge or return, to be paid by the said corporation or its assigns to the United States, the proceeds thereof to be used for the development of navigation on the Connecticut River and the waters connected therewith.

Under the power to regulate commerce among the States, the Congress may, in my opinion, in consenting to the construction of a dam across a navigable stream, impose a condition that the licensee shall pay a reasonable sum of money to be used for the improvement of navigation, and it is not necessary that the money so paid should be expended at the immediate site of the dam. If the only power of Congress in the case of the Connecticut River dam is to require the licensee not to obstruct navigation, but to leave it in as good condition as formerly, Congress never could have required the licensee to construct a lock at Windsor Locks, because the river was not navigable at that point before the dam was built.

I do not care to discuss the question further. I have said that simply because, if I remember correctly, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], for whose legal judgment I have the highest respect, took the ground in answering the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that possibly Congress could exact the money if it was to be spent in the improvement of navigation immediately at the site of the dam for which it was granting the license. I take the view that if it can provide, as a condition of issuing a license for a dam across a navigable river, that a lock must be built in aid of navigation and paid for by the licensee, it can equally consistently exact a money payment for the promotion of navigation under the clause of the Constitution which authorizes us to regulate commerce among the States; and I am quite certain that if it is expended anywhere on the river for the improvement of commerce among the States, as represented by river navigation, it would be sustained by the Supreme Court.

I will say further, Mr. President, if that question should ever be presented to the Supreme Court and my view of it should be declared to be not the correct one, very little damage would be done to anybody. I do not see how we are ever going to arrive at a solution of a question like this, which affects simply one part of the country and is of no interest to other parts of the country, unless it is to be made a precedent or a pattern for legislation of a similar character in particular States, to which they may object, or unless we pass something and let somebody, some stockholder, perhaps, refuse to pay the compensation provided for and take it to the Supreme Court and find out what we can do and what we can not do in these cases. Perhaps half the lawyers in the Senate think one way and the other half the other on this question; perhaps the court itself may divide; but we certainly can never arrive anywhere in the development of our water power, which is now running to waste all over the country, by having the Chief Executive veto all the bills that we pass which do not contain a provision for some sort of compensation and by having one House or the other block their passage if they do contain it.

After this bill has been properly discussed for as many days as Senators want to discuss it, I see no better way than to pass the bill and test that question. But when we get to the bill I am going to talk on the provisions of the bill as much as I can. While I have views on these interesting subjects that are discussed here—the general questions of water power throughout the country, which, as I said, are sometimes obscure and intricate—I hope after Senators have obtained all the information from each other on those very interesting subjects they will not allow the information so acquired to prejudice them against this particular bill unless it conflicts with some serious constitutional view which they may entertain.

SUPPLEMENTAL PATENTS TO ENTRYMEN.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to call up Senate bill 6402, a measure that will take only a minute or two to pass and to which there can be no possible objection. I believe it will lead to no discussion. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 6402) to authorize the issuance of absolute and unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, in cases where patents for public lands have been issued to entrymen under the provisions of the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1909, and June 22, 1910, reserving to the United States all coal deposits therein, and lands so patented are subsequently classified as noncoal in character, to issue new or supplemental patents to such entrymen, conveying to them the absolute and unqualified title to the lands so previously entered, patented, and thereafter classified as noncoal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIGENT PERSONS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From the Committee on Territories I report back the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 267) providing for assisting indigent persons, other than natives, in the District of Alaska, which were referred to that committee on May 9, 1912. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 22913) to create a department of labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PAGE. I should like to know what the bill is before I give my consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume the Senator is not going to press the bill for consideration to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Not for final consideration. I wish, if I can, to dispose of the committee amendments to-day. I do not think there are any amendments which any Senator would care to discuss; they are mostly formal. I will not ask for a final vote to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is any objection to an amendment, the Senator will ask to have it go over?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendments in section 3, page 3, line 11, after the word "Immigration," where it occurs the second time, to insert "and Naturalization"; in line 12, after the word "Information," to insert "the Division of Naturalization"; and in line 24, after the words "Labor Statistics," to insert "and the administration of the act of May 30, 1908, granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the following-named officers, bureaus, divisions, and branches of the public service now and heretofore under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and all that pertains to the same, known as the Commissioner General of Immigration, the commissioners of immigration, the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, the Division of Information, the Division of Naturalization, and the Immigration Service at large, the Bureau of Labor, and the Commissioner of Labor, be, and the same hereby are, transferred from the Department of Commerce and Labor to the Department of Labor, and the same shall hereafter remain under the jurisdiction and supervision of the last-named department. The Bureau of Labor shall hereafter be known as the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and the Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor shall hereafter be known as the Commissioner of Labor Statistics; and all the powers and duties heretofore possessed by the Commissioner of Labor shall be retained and exercised by the Commissioner of Labor Statistics; and the administration of the act of May 30, 1908, granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. As that disposes of the committee amendments and it is late, and several Senators who are not here——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho possibly overlooked that the bill specifies it shall go into effect October 1, 1912.

Mr. BORAH. At the proper time I will offer an amendment on that line.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if all the committee amendments have been disposed of?

Mr. BORAH. Those are all the amendments that I desire to have considered at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to have a little bill passed.

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment I will yield. I ask to have the bill reprinted with the committee amendments included.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BORAH. I now ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

JOSEPH HODGES.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7754) for the relief of Joseph Hodges.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add to the end of the bill the following proviso: "Provided, That upon the reconveyance of the surrendered lands they will become a part of the Cache National Forest," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue a patent to Joseph Hodges for the following-described lands: The southwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the south half of the northwest quarter of section 29; the south half of the northeast quarter and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 30; the west half of the southeast quarter and the west half of the northeast quarter of section 15; the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 10, all in township 13 north, range 5 east, of Salt Lake meridian, upon the transfer by the said Joseph Hodges to the United States of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 3; the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 26; the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 27; the south half of section 16, all in township 14 north, range 4 east, of Salt Lake meridian, situate in the Cache National Forest: Provided, That upon the reconveyance of the surrendered lands they will become a part of the Cache National Forest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House accepts the invitation of the Senate extended to the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives to attend the exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public services of the late JAMES S. SHERMAN, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, to be held in the Senate Chamber on Saturday, the 15th day of February next, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 28499. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 8, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for this new day with all its hopes and promises. Thou hast created us for action and inspired us with high ideals. Illumine our minds and quicken within us the highest and best impulses, that we may add as individuals to our parts and strive to better the conditions of our fellow men; to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDICTMENTS, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 808) which is on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 808.

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives at the earliest practical date all letters, briefs of evidence, documents, and written opinions on file in the Department of Justice relating to or having any connection with the indictment returned in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas against C. N. Payne, John D. Archbold, Henry C. Folger, W. C. Teagle, A. C. Eble, E. R. Brown, John Sealy, Standard Oil Co. of New York, Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, and Magnolia Petroleum Co. of Texas, charging them with conspiring to restrain interstate trade and commerce of the Pierce-Fordyce Oil Association in violation of the criminal provisions of the Sherman Act, or relating in any way to the order of the Attorney General of the United States directing the United States marshal for the southern district of New York not to execute bench warrants for the arrest of John D. Archbold, W. C. Teagle, and H. C. Folger, jr., issued on said indictment.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, there are some committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 2, strike out "requested" and insert "directed, if not incompatible with the public interest."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARNER. There are one or two other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "Folger," insert the word "junior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the capital letter "H" and insert the word "Henry."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman about the substitution of the word "request" for the word "direct." Is this the case where a Federal judge in Texas issued subpœnas for certain Standard Oil people in New York City and the Department of Justice refused to serve the warrants?

Mr. GARNER. It is. It was not a subpœna. It was a capias.

Mr. MURDOCK. Issued by the judge?

Mr. GARNER. Issued by the court on a grand jury indictment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has any explanation ever been made by the Department of Justice why they did not serve these papers?

Mr. GARNER. The Department of Justice——

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. GARNER. I would like an opportunity to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will get at it in this way: The resolution as introduced into this House directed the Attorney General to explain to the House why these warrants were not served.

Mr. GARNER. When was that?

Mr. MURDOCK. As I understand it, that was it.

Mr. GARNER. No; this resolution——

Mr. MURDOCK. It must have been introduced, because the committee now brings in a resolution with an amendment changing the word "directed" to the word "requested."

Mr. GARNER. No; it is just the reverse of that, changing the word "requested" to "directed."

Mr. MURDOCK. So the resolution as it now stands is more mandatory than the original resolution?

Mr. GARNER. It certainly is.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am glad of that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on Senate bill 7160, an act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Amendment No. 4, the case of Martin Parker (S. 4063): In this case the item was stricken from the bill on the ground that the evidence did not warrant further increase, and the Senate recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 5, the case of Benjamin F. Adams (S. 4072): This item was stricken from the bill by the House, but on further investigation it is believed the increase is warranted, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 6, the case of Mary Byrne (S. 4187): In this case the amount allowed was reduced by the House from $30 to $20, and the Senate recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 7, the case of Alice O. Lord (S. 5509): In this case the widow did not marry until 1895, and hence the House struck the item from the bill. The Senate recedes.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendment No. 1 is the case of Thomas W. Dickey (S. 300): The man was never regularly mustered into the service of the Government, and hence the item was stricken from the bill; and the Senate recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 2, the case of Addie Roof (S. 2379): In this case the widow married the soldier in 1892, a short time after the passage of the 1890 law, and was stricken from the bill on those grounds. The House recedes from this amendment, as a number of similar cases have since been passed.

Amendment No. 3, the case of Andrew King (S. 5657): In this case the Senate allowed a rate of $30; the House reduced the amount to $24; and the Senate recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 4, the case of James Luther Justice (S. 6968): In this case the Senate allowed $30, and the House $24. The Senate recedes from its disagreement.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

House order 76.

Ordered, That on next Monday, February 10, the House shall stand in recess from the hour of 5 o'clock p. m., until the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., at which time it shall be in order to consider, only in the House as in Committee of the Whole, bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Agriculture appropriation bill, with Mr. BEALL of Texas in the chair.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, upon confirmation of reports that the hull of the frigate Philadelphia has been located under water in the harbor of Tripoli, I introduced a bill, which has the approval of the Department of the Navy, for a small appropriation for a survey to recover the hull or such portions thereof, including guns and other equipment, as may seem to the Secretary of the Navy desirable. The Government has recently spent large sums in recovering and disposing of the wreck of the Maine in Havana Harbor and has just completed the appropriate service of transporting the remains of the illustrious John Paul Jones to their last resting place at Annapolis, so that if authority is given in this instance to recover such relics of the Philadelphia as may be worthy of preservation, it will be in line with precedent and will tend to rekindle in the United States a spirit of patrotism of most wholesome import.

The age in which we live is one of commercialism, when it is difficult for the Department of the Navy to secure recruits for that service upon the high seas, which in times of war is so essential. With a declining merchant marine on the one hand and the rearing of great battleships on the other, it is refreshing to recall the incidents leading up to the American invasion of the Mediterranean Sea and the suppression of piracy along the Barbary coast.

So intimately connected with this earlier history was the frigate Philadelphia that a discussion of the bill making an appropriation for her recovery not only invites comparison of our maritime prowess and enterprise of more than a century ago, but readily reveals one of the most interesting chapters in our naval annals. It is both helpful and inspiring.

DONATED BY THE MERCHANTS.

Built 114 years ago, the vessel was commonly regarded as one of the hugest warships afloat. A description of her, taken from memoranda in the Navy Department, shows her to have been a frigate of 1,240 tons, with 36 guns—elsewhere reported as 44—and 307 men. She appears to have been not more than 200 feet long—about one-third the length of a modern battleship—and of 40 feet beam. She was built at Philadelphia in 1799 by subscriptions of the merchants of that city, and cost $179,349. All the details of design and construction are not available, but one of those who superintended her building in the summer of 1799 was Capt. Thomas Robinson, appointed captain in the Navy September 24, 1799, and who served until discharged by the Peace-Establishment act, September 26, 1801. The frigate was launched Thursday, November 28, 1799, as shown by the following announcement taken from the Philadelphia Gazette and Universal Daily Advertiser of Friday, November 29, 1799:

"THE LAUNCH.

"Frigate 'City of Philadelphia.'

"At half past 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon this elegant ship was safely launched into the Delaware, accompanied by the acclamations of thousands of spectators who lined the shore. As soon as she was afloat salutes were fired from the Augusta and Richmond, armed brigs laying at anchor in the cove.

"The tide serving at an earlier hour than was expected, owing to a strong wind from the southeast, the launch took place sooner than was intended, by which a great number of people who promised themselves the pleasure of viewing this beautiful operation were disappointed, but who were, however, much gratified by afterwards seeing one of the finest ships ever built in this country safely moored.

"The City of Philadelphia is an evidence of the patriotism of the merchants of the city after which she is named, being built by their subscriptions; will carry 44 heavy guns and be commanded by Capt. Decatur, formerly of the Delaware, sloop of war."

FRIGATE MADE MANY CAPTURES.

In the Navy lists the ship was entered as Philadelphia. She sailed from her home city on a cruise to the West Indies in 1800 as flagship of a squadron of 13 vessels under command of Capt. Stephen Decatur, senior. During this cruise she captured 5 vessels from the French.

Her second cruise, 1801–2, was in the Mediterranean under command of Capt. Samuel Barron.

July 28, 1803, she sailed from Philadelphia on her third and last cruise, commanded by Capt. William Bainbridge.

August 26, 1803, shortly after she had reached the Mediterranean, she captured, near Cape de Gatt, the Tripolitan ship Meshboha, or Murboka, and recaptured from her the American brig Cecelia, of Boston.

TEMPORIZING WITH THE PIRATES.

Up to this time the record of the Philadelphia had been one of unvarying successes, and she had come to be regarded as a terror of the seas. It was her business, along with others of the fleet, to protect American merchantmen against privateers and pirates, and the Mediterranean expedition was in the nature of a notice to the Emperor of Morocco and the Arabian beys, who were demanding tribute of the United States, that the American Navy was a power to be reckoned with.

The official reports of the time indicate that the United States under President Jefferson had a great deal of trouble satisfying these mercenary cormorants, who insisted upon the payment of fixed stipends for allowing merchantmen to do business in the Mediterranean. The diplomatic negotiations were of such a nature as to be almost amusing, as we would now view them, because of the strangely worded memorials addressed to the various barbarian rulers with the hope of appeasing their dignity as well as their appetite for tribute. So unbearable had their exactions become, however, that Commodore Preble was finally sent to meet the situation squarely, and the Philadelphia being of his squadron, had tremendous influence in alleviating it.

LURED UPON THE ROCKS.

The consternation following the capture of the Philadelphia by the Tripolitans may, therefore, well be imagined. And the incident was all the more distressing because it gave no opportunity to Capt. Bainbridge and his men to fight their way out of captivity. While chasing a Tripolitan ship, on October 31, 1803, the Philadelphia ran on an uncharted rock in the harbor of Tripoli. It was commonly asserted, and the Tripolitans sometimes boasted of it, that the Philadelphia had been lured to her fate. Be that as it may, every effort was at once made to get her off. In the endeavor to lighten her three anchors were thrown from the bows, the water in the hold started, and guns were hove overboard, except some abaft retained to defend the ship against the gunboats which surrounded her. For four hours Capt. Bainbridge withstood the fire of the Tripolitan ships, gunboats, and the fire from the shore batteries, but seeing that reenforcements were coming out, he decided to strike his flag rather than further endanger the lives of his brave men.

THE NATIVES IN POSSESSION.

The Tripolitans took possession of the frigate shortly after sunset. The officers and a few of the men were taken to the house of the American consul, Mr. Cathcart, ashore, and were quartered there for the night. Next morning, the consul becoming their guaranty to the bashaw for the officers, they were paroled. Forty-three officers and men were placed in the consulate for the time, and 264 men and boys were quartered in the bashaw's palace.

The aggravation resulting from the capture of the Philadelphia and the imprisonment of Capt. Bainbridge and his men, was heightened by the refitting of the Philadelphia after she was taken from the rocks for the cruising purposes of the Tripolitans. Thus this most formidable champion of the American Navy was made to do service as an enemy of her country, and her hostile flag was flaunted in the very faces of the American captives behind the walls of the bashaw's castle.

The depressing effects of the capture of the Philadelphia were felt throughout the United States and by all the foreign countries that had been paying liberal tribute to the Tripolitans; but it was left for Lieut. Stephen Decatur, son of the first commander of the Philadelphia, who brother's life was given to the service in one of these Mediterranean Sea fights, to propose and to organize the expedition which was not only to be eminently successful, but destined to make the name Decatur a synonym for physical courage and bravery the world over.

DECATUR RECAPTURES THE FRIGATE.

Securing the approval of Commodore Preble, Lieut. Decatur, detached from the frigate Siren, started out on the night of February 16, 1804, in the captured ketch, renamed the Intrepid. Accompanied by 11 officers and 62 men, with an Italian pilot, he sailed into the harbor of Tripoli, boarded the Philadelphia, took possession of her after a desperate encounter, set fire to her, and returned to the ketch without the loss of a single man. Twenty of the Tripolitans on the Philadelphia were killed, a large boatload escaped, many jumped overboard and were drowned, and one was taken prisoner. Throughout the encounter on the Philadelphia, and particularly after the alarm had been sounded and the flames were eating into the rigging, Decatur and his comrades were subjected to the fire of Tripolitan cruisers, gunboats, and batteries on the shore. In an extract from the report of this brilliant and daring exploit it is stated that the guns on the frigate at the time Decatur boarded her were mounted and charged. Whether any of those guns went down with the Philadelphia and are still in a state capable of preservation remains to be seen. It is said, however, that the burning of the Philadelphia had the most salutary effect upon the pirates and stimulated the officers and men of the American Navy as nothing had done before.

REASON FOR BURNING THE VESSEL.

That Decatur did not save the Philadelphia, after driving the pirates off, was due to his literal observance of the orders given by Commodore Preble. The enterprise was regarded as of so hazardous a nature as to be dubious of execution, and the commodore, fearing that any attempt at capture would result in failure, directed the destruction of the ship. He wanted to make sure, at least, of the effectiveness of American arms.

It would be entertaining in a high degree to recall the testimony of those who accompanied Decatur on his perilous expedition; to describe the sensations of the American captives behind the walls of Tripoli as the fire of the Philadelphia illuminated the skies, or to recount the manifestations of delight and approval upon the return of the Intrepid to the American squadron; but all that may be passed for the present. The roll of those who acclaimed the heroic deed of Decatur and his men included the Prebles, the Stewarts, the Dales, the Bainbridges, the Porters, the Lawrences, the Perrys, the Smiths, the McDonoughs, and many other glorious names of this most thrilling period of America's naval history.

JEFFERSON'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS.

In a message to Congress, March 20, 1804, President Jefferson transmitted the letter of Capt. Bainbridge, announcing the loss of the frigate Philadelphia. It was dated Tripoli, November 1, 1803, and was addressed to the Hon. R. Smith, Secretary of the Navy. "Misfortune necessitates me to make a communication the most distressing of my life," Capt. Bainbridge began, and then he proceeded to tell in detail the chase after the Tripolitan cruiser and the rounding up upon the rocks. "We have lost everything but what was on our backs," he concluded, "and even part of that was taken off." In a postscript he added: "Notwithstanding our parole, we are not permitted to leave the house, or go on the top of it, and they have closed our view of the sea." The lament of Capt. Bainbridge was shared by David Porter, then a lieutenant, and others of the captives, who afterwards achieved distinction in naval affairs. In the court-martial proceedings, presided over by Capt. James Barron, it was shown among other things that Capt. Bainbridge had destroyed the signal books of the Philadelphia and had, with "great coolness and deliberation," taken other steps to minimize the effect of the loss of the ship to the Tripolitans. The court found that Capt. Bainbridge "acted with fortitude," and "that no degree of censure should attach itself to him."

DECATUR'S ORDERS FROM PREBLE.

Such was the plight of the Navy when the project of the younger Decatur was laid before Commodore Preble. What Decatur was expected to do is shown in the following orders from his commodore:

UNITED STATES FRIGATE "CONSTITUTION,"
Syracuse Harbor, January 31, 1804.

SIR: You are hereby ordered to take command of the prize ketch, which I have named the Intrepid, and prepare her with all possible despatch for a cruise of thirty days, with full allowance of water, provisions, &c., for seventy-five men. I shall send you five midshipmen from the Constitution, and you will take seventy men, including officers, from the Enterprise, if that number can be found ready to volunteer their services for boarding and burning the Philadelphia in the harbor of Tripoli; if not, report to me, and I will furnish you with men to complete your complement. It is expected you will be ready to sail tomorrow evening, or some hours sooner, if the signal is made for that purpose.

It is my orders that you proceed to Tripoli, in company with the Syren, Lieutenant Stewart, enter the harbor in the night, board the Philadelphia, burn her, and make good your retreat, with the Intrepid, if possible, unless you can make her the means of destroying the enemy's vessels in the harbor, by converting her into a fireship, for that purpose, and retreating in your boats and those of the Syren. You must take fixed ammunition and apparatus for the frigate's 18-pounders, and if you can, without risking too much, you may endeavor to make them the instruments of destruction to the shipping and Bashaw's castle. You will provide all the necessary combustibles for burning and destroying ships. The destruction of the Philadelphia is an object of great importance, and I rely with confidence on your intrepidity and enterprise to effect it. Lieutenant Stewart will support you with the boats of the Syren, and cover your retreat with that vessel. Be sure and set fire in the gun-room births, cock-pit, store-rooms forward, and births on the birth-deck.

After the ship is well on fire, point two of the 18-pounders, shotted, down the main hatch, and blow her bottom out. I enclose you a memorandum of the articles, arms, ammunition, fireworks, &c., necessary, and which you are to take with you. Return to this place as soon as possible, and report to me your proceedings. On boarding the frigate, it is probable you may meet with resistance—it will be well, in order to prevent alarm, to carry all by the sword. May God prosper and succeed you in this enterprise.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient serv't,

EDWARD PREBLE.

Lieut. Commandant DECATUR,

THE WORK DONE AS ORDERED.

How well the work of destroying the Philadelphia was executed is shown by Lieut. Commandant S. Decatur's report to Commodore Preble. It was as follows:

ON BOARD THE KETCH "INTREPID," AT SEA,
February 17, 1804.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that in pursuance to your orders of the 31st ultimo, to proceed with this ketch off the harbor of Tripoli, there to endeavor to effect the destruction of the late United States' frigate Philadelphia, I arrived there in company with the United States' brig Syren, lieutenant-commandant Stewart, on the 7th, but owing to the badness of the weather, was unable to effect any thing until last evening, when we had a light breeze from the N. E. At 7 o'clock I entered the harbor with the Intrepid, the Syren having gained her station without the harbor, in a situation to support us in our retreat. At half past 9 o'clock, laid her alongside of the Philadelphia, boarded, and after a short contest, carried her. I immediately fired her in the store-rooms, gun-room, cock-pit, and birth-deck, and remained on board until the flames had issued from the spar-deck, hatchways, and ports, and before I had got from alongside, the fire had communicated to the rigging and tops. Previous to our boarding, they had got their tompions out, and hailed several times, but not a gun fired.

The noise occasioned by boarding and contending for possession, although no fire-arms were used, gave a general alarm on shore, and on board their cruisers, which lay about a cable and a half's length from us, and many boats filled with men lay around, but from whom we received no annoyance. They commenced a fire on us from all their batteries on shore, but with no other effect than one shot passing through our top-gallant sail.

The frigate was moored within half-gunshot of the Bashaw's castle, and of their principal battery—two of their cruisers lay within two cables' length on the starboard quarter, and their gun-boats within half gunshot on the starboard bow. She had all her guns mounted and loaded, which, as they became hot went off. As she lay with her broadside to the town, I have no doubt but some damage has been done by them. Before I had got out of the harbor, her cables had burnt off, and she had drifted in under the castle, where she was consumed. I can form no judgment as to the number of men on board, but there were twenty killed. A large boat full got off, and many leapt into the sea. We have made one prisoner, and I fear from the number of bad wounds he has received he will not recover, although every assistance and comfort has been given him.

I boarded with sixty men and officers, leaving a guard on board the ketch for her defence, and it is with the greatest pleasure I inform you, I had not a man killed in this affair, and but one slightly wounded. Every support that could be given I received from my officers, and as the conduct of each was highly meritorious, I beg leave to enclose you a list of their names. Permit me also, sir, to speak of the brave fellows I have the honor to command, whose coolness and intrepidity was such as I trust will ever characterise the American tars.

It would be injustice in me, were I to pass over the important services rendered by Mr. Salvadore [Catalano], the pilot, on whose good conduct the success of the enterprise in the greatest degree depended. He gave me entire satisfaction.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.,

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Com. EDWARD PREBLE,
Com. U. S. Squadron in the Mediterranean.

EXTRACTS FROM PREBLE'S OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

Reporting the work of Decatur to the department at Washington, Commodore Preble said:

UNITED STATES' SHIP "CONSTITUTION,"
Syracuse Harbor, 19th of February, 1804.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the United States' brig Syren, lieutenant-commander Stewart, and ketch Intrepid, of four guns, lieutenant commandant Decatur, arrived here last evening from a cruise. They left this port the 3d instant, with my orders to proceed to Tripoli, and burn the frigate, late the United States' frigate Philadelphia, at anchor in that harbor. I was well informed that her situation was such as to render it impossible to bring her out, and her destruction being absolutely necessary to favor my intended operations against that city, I determined the attempt should be made. I enclose you copies of my orders on this occasion, which have been executed in the most gallant and officer-like manner by lieutenant commandant Decatur, assisted by the brave officers and crew of the little ketch Intrepid, under his command. Their conduct in the performance of the dangerous service assigned them, cannot be sufficiently estimated. It is beyond all praise. Had lieutenant Decatur delayed one-half hour for the boats of the Syren to have joined him, he would have failed in the main object, as a gale commenced immediately after the frigate was on fire, and it was with difficulty the ketch was got out of the harbor. The Syren, owing to the lightness of the breeze in the evening, was obliged to anchor at a considerable distance from the city, which prevented her boats from rendering such assistance as they might have done, had they entered the harbor earlier.

Lieutenant Stewart took the best position without the harbor to cover the retreat of the Intrepid, that the lightness of the breeze would admit of; his conduct through the expedition has been judicious and highly meritorious. But few of the officers of the squadron could be gratified by sharing in the danger and honor of the enterprise.

In justice to them, I beg leave to observe, that they all offered to volunteer their services on the occasion, and I am confident, whenever an opportunity offers to distinguish themselves, that they will do honor to the service. I enclose you lieutenant commandants Stewart and Decatur's official communications, with names of the officers on board the ketch.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant.

EDWARD PREBLE.

A STATEMENT OF THE ENEMY'S STRENGTH.

The Philadelphia at the time she was destroyed was lying in the harbor of Tripoli, protected not only by her own guns and a considerable number of Turks on board, but by a number of batteries on shore, gunboats, galleys, etc., viz:

	Guns.
Fort English, mounting	7
American	7
Palace	10
Between Palace and Molehead	14
Molehead Crown battery	19
Fort Way	11
Two small batteries	9
Malta battery	9
Half-moon battery	10
West Diamond battery	9
Battery with arched embrasures	3
Western battery	7
Of heavy caliber	115

19 gunboats.
2 schooners of 8 guns each and one brig of 10 guns.

All the batteries and vessels were fully manned; the whole number of troops estimated at 25,000 Arabs, etc. The whole naval force of the United States in the Mediterranean at that period was 1 frigate, 3 brigs, 3 schooners, 2 bombs, and 6 gunboats, manned by 1,060 men. Before the Philadelphia was taken by the Tripolitans the demand of the bashaw of Tripoli for peace was $200,000 and the repayment of all his expenses during the war. After her destruction he agreed to make peace on our terms, viz, exchange of prisoners, man for man, and $60,000 for the surplus in his possession. The bey of Tunis had frequently threatened war, but was deterred, no doubt, by the impression produced by the energy of our squadron.

Commodore Preble, to the Secretary of the Navy, February 3, 1804, estimates the American captives in Tripoli at 300; the Tripolitan captives, 60; balance of prisoners in favor of Tripoli, 240.

So much for a better understanding of the importance and effectiveness of Decatur's work. It terrified the pirates and brought them to terms.

THE LOG OF THE SLOOP "SIREN."

Amongst the tomes of the Navy Department is still preserved the original log of the U. S. sloop of war Siren (spelled Siren in the log, spelled Syren elsewhere—J. H. M.) of 18 guns, then under the command of Lieut. Charles Stewart, afterwards a famous commodore, and from it I have been permitted to make the following extract, which tells in the language of the sailor the story of Decatur's wonderful adventure:

"THURSDAY, 16TH FEBRUARY, 1804.

A BORN SAILOR AND FIGHTER.

At the time of his great achievement Stephen Decatur was 25 years of age. He was a born sailor and fighter, having been recognized throughout the Navy as one of the most gallant and intrepid of leaders. He had been in active service long before the Tripoli affair, and continued in the service after his promotion two grades, and about 10 years in recognition of it, until 1820, when on March 22, in a duel with Commodore Barron at Bladensburg he lost his life. The duel was one of those deplorable tragedies, due largely to the false chivalry characteristic of the times. The death of Decatur was universally deplored. He was buried at Kalorama, in the District of Columbia; but having, in connection with his proposed participation in the management of the congressional burial ground at Washington, expressed a desire to be buried near the tomb of his parents, at St. Peter's Church, in Philadelphia, his body was subsequently removed to that place. It was received at Philadelphia with military and civic honors, and a popular movement was at once instituted to erect a monument befitting his life and character. On each return of his birthday, January 5, the ladies of the Stephen Decatur Chapter of the Daughters of 1812 are accustomed to visit and decorate the grave. The monument consists of an ionic column, surmounded by an American eagle.

EFFORTS TO LOCATE THE WRECK.

Mr. Chairman, several efforts have been made since the death of Decatur to locate the wreck of the Philadelphia. In June, 1905, Charles Wellington Furlong made an examination of the Barbary coast at Tripoli through the courtesy of Muchia Redjed Pasha, commander in chief of the Turkish forces in Tripoli. In that inspection, in which he was aided by marine divers, Mr. Furlong discovered the location of the wreck and managed to recover a cannon ball from her timbers in addition to some copper nails. His investigation, however, did not result in any steps being taken to recover the hull. After the Turks were driven out of Tripoli in the recent war with Italy, Mr. Harold Sherwood Spencer, who was attached to one of the New York newspapers, interested himself in the matter, consulting the American consul at Tripoli, in Barbary, and the American ambassador to Italy, as appears from the following correspondence:

TRIPOLI, BARBARY, October 10, 1912.

MY DEAR MR. O'BRIEN: Within a very few weeks the Italians, in their work of improving the harbor, will reach the site of the wreck of our famous frigate Philadelphia.

Although the wreck is at present in a good state of preservation, and only in 10 feet of water, the proposed harbor improvements will tear up the old ship piecemeal, burying part of it under a breakwater.

To me, and I hope you feel likewise, a ship of such a glorious past as our Philadelphia should be raised and buried at sea. At least the keel and some of her old cannon might be taken to Annapolis or Washington as relics.

* * * * * * *

It seems fit that our ambassador to Italy should recover our ship from what are now Italian waters. If you are interested will you please wire me, care of the consul here.

Respectfully,

HAROLD SHERWOOD SPENCER.

STATE AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS INTERESTED.

NOVEMBER 23, 1912.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter of November 19 (3809/315:1) in which, referring to this department's letter of the 13th instant, you advise me that the naval attaché at Rome has been instructed by telegraph to proceed to Tripoli and investigate the possibility of raising the wreck of the Philadelphia from the harbor at that port.

As of possible interest in this connection, I take occasion to inclose herewith a copy of a dispatch on this subject which has now been received from the American consul at Tripoli.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HUNTINGTON WILSON,
Acting Secretary of State.

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
Tripoli-in-Barbary, October 16, 1912.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

SIR: I have the honor to report to the department that Mr. Harold Sherwood Spencer is desirous of making an effort to rescue the remains of the old U. S. S. frigate Philadelphia, which was wrecked off the harbor of Tripoli October 31, 1803, captured by the Tripoli pirates with whom we were at war and brought into port, and in February, 1804, destroyed by burning through the daring and famous exploit of Lieut. Decatur.

Mr. Spencer was a student at Annapolis for several years, but resigned in the latter part of 1910 for the purpose of preparing to enter the diplomatic service. He has, however, since then been engaged in newspaper and literary work, and was sent here last November by Mr. Bennett as special war correspondent of the New York Herald. He left Tripoli in December and returned to New York in June of this year, where he has a temporary residence at the Vanderbilt Hotel.

Mr. Spencer desires to present the remains of the Philadelphia to the Naval Institute, of which he is a member, or to the museum of the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Believing this project to be a most worthy enterprise, I presented Mr. Spencer to Governor General Ragni and requested permission for him to raise the Philadelphia. The request was most graciously accorded by His Excellency, who displayed much interest in the enterprise. Later he asked us to go on the terrace of the castle for the purpose of having pointed out the precise location of the wreck, which lies in about 10 feet of water very near the Spanish fort. The governor general also stated that he would be pleased to assist Mr. Spencer in his efforts.

Preliminary surveys are being made to determine what part of the wreck can be rescued and the approximate cost of the work.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN Q. WOOD,
American Consul.

DECEMBER —, 1912.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

SIR: Referring to previous correspondence concerning project for raising the wreck of the U. S. frigate Philadelphia from the harbor of Tripoli, I have the honor to inclose herewith for your information a copy of a report on this subject from the American consul at Tripoli, under date of the 30th ultimo.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

P. C. KNOX.

NAVAL ATTACHÉ MAKES ESTIMATE.

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
Tripoli in Barbary, November 30, 1912.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

SIR: I have the honor to report the arrival of our naval attaché at Rome, Lieut. Richard Drace White, in pursuance of orders from the Navy Department, to examine and report on the project of raising the U. S. frigate Philadelphia. Commander White was received most cordially by Gov. Gen. Ragni and has been given every possible assistance. The command of the port has been placed at his disposition, and during the examination of the wreck, on the 29th instant, the day after arrival, the gasoline launch of the governor general was sent to Commander White, with instructions to the officer in charge to report to him for orders.

It has been possible to locate the wreck, and the firm of Almagia, now engaged on the port works, has given an estimate of the cost of raising the remains of the old frigate. It has appeared to me to be very excessive, although I confess to a lack of experience in such matters, and therefore would not care to advance an opinion as to a reasonable cost of successfully carrying out such a project.

I would state that the arrival of Commander White has created a great local interest in the history of our naval and military operations in this country, and especially in the outcome of the inspection and report that will be sent to the Navy Department by our naval attaché. A copy of La Nuova Italia is herewith inclosed, containing an article on the Philadelphia, which may be of some interest, although several of the facts are not accurate. On account of lack of time it has been impossible to make a translation.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN Q. WOOD,
American Consul.

ITALIAN OFFICIALS AND NEWSPAPERS FRIENDLY.

Along with the correspondence just quoted is a translation of the article from La Nuova Italia, of Tripoli, Africa, dated November 29, 1912, which, under the heading "A glorious page of American history rises from the bottom of the Libian Sea," reviews in eloquent terms the gallantry of Decatur and his crew and bespeaks the utmost courtesy on the part of Gen. Ragni, the Italian commander, should the American Government desire to take steps in the matter. In addition I have a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who has expressed his approval of an appropriation for the raising of the Philadelphia, in which he transmits, at my request, a copy of the report of the naval attaché who recently undertook an inspection of the hull of the Philadelphia and who was instructed to report as to the conditions surrounding it. This report, which is appended in full, indicates clearly that the hull and such relics as may remain in it can be recovered for twelve or fifteen thousand dollars, provided the recovery is attempted before the Italian Government proceeds with the construction work which may obliterate the wreck forever.

EXISTING CONDITIONS SURROUNDING THE HULL.

ROME, December 9, 1912.

From: Naval attaché, Rome and Vienna.
To: Director of Naval Intelligence.
Subject: Proposed salving of the wreck of the U. S. S. Philadelphia in the harbor of Tripoli, in Barbary.
Reference: O. N. I. telegram of November 16, 1912.

1. I have proceeded according to the instructions contained in the reference.

2. In the work of investigating the wreck, the commander in chief of the naval force in Tripoli, the governor, and the commanding general of the military force have been extremely courteous and have facilitated the work. I have been greatly aided by the American consul, Mr. John Q. Wood, and by Mr. Harold S. Spencer, who had very thoroughly investigated the wreck previous to my arrival. These two gentlemen devoted all their time to helping and advising me while I was engaged in this work. I was also greatly aided by Mr. William S. Riley, an Englishman resident in Tripoli for 25 years, who has become interested in the work.

BURIED IN TWO AND A HALF FATHOMS.

3. I find that the wreck lies in about 2½ fathoms of water on the bearings indicated in the inclosure marked "B." This part of the bay is soon to be filled in and warehouses, railways, etc., built thereon. No excavations are to be made here, however, as was at first reported.

4. It appears that she lies on her side (thought to be starboard, though this is uncertain), her keel in a line approximately northeast and southwest. She is entirely covered by sand, except for a portion approximately 35 feet in length on the above-mentioned bearing and 15 feet in width, in which space portions are visible in places projecting above the sand bottom in some cases as much as 1½ feet.

WHAT THE DIVERS DISCOVERED.

5. There are three or four projections visible, which appear to be ribs or frames of the hull. These appear to curve upward, which leads me to believe that they are situated near the bow or the stern. This is, however, only a surmise, as the curvature may only be apparent. There are several planks which extend in a northeasterly direction and end abruptly. Beyond their end is a rectangular piece lying at right angles to the lengthwise direction of the planks.

6. The divers who investigated the wreck report that the whole wreck is imbedded in sand in the form of a mound, which slopes off in all directions from the wreck. They sawed off portions and found the planking covered with copper in a state of partial decomposition, and also found the remains of nails now corroded so that they are nothing but hardened rust.

7. The divers who made the examination; the engineer in charge of the divers, Mr. Spencer; Mr. Riley; the American consul, Mr. John Q. Wood; and I are agreed in the opinion that the part visible is the remains of the ribs and skin of the ship. The planking which ends so abruptly we believe to have sprung loose, or been pried loose, from the frames and to have straightened out more or less. We conclude that the ship sunk on the original bottom of the harbor, which slopes away abruptly to the northeast, with one end much lower than the other, and that the sand which now covers her has sifted in, making the harbor at this point much shallower than it was at the time she sank.

8. Granting that the ship was 40 feet in beam and 200 feet long, she must extend in the sand to a depth of approximately 40 feet, and for a length of approximately 200 feet.

9. When Mr. Spencer, in his letter to the American ambassador to Rome, dated October 10, suggested raising her, he was of the opinion that the ship rested on an approximately even keel and did not extend deep into the sand, and his idea was that she could be scooped out and lifted with shears and got on shore intact. The belief that she lies on her side, however, and must extend deep into the sand bottom makes that project appear impracticable, and it is now believed that the best way to attempt to raise her is to dredge around her and inside her as much as practicable and then raise her with floats and chains, if practicable, intact; otherwise, in sections cut adrift before being lifted.

LOCAL COMPANY COULD DO THE WORK.

10. In this connection the lack of facilities available at Tripoli for work of this character has been considered. There is a floating crane of 75 (I am told) tons capacity. There are some small lighters; there are some small cranes on shore. That is practically all. There is also to be considered the weather, which is very bad at this season, and the fact that a company is under contract to fill in the space where the wreck lies within a certain period and with perfect right to interfere with any operations which would delay them in their work.

11. This company, viz, Ditta Almagia, have, at my request, made an estimate as to what they would charge to raise her. Their estimate is $12,000 to raise her entirely and put her on the beach. The project is to raise her intact, but this may become impracticable, in which case it would be necessary to raise her piece by piece. Their estimate is based on the assumption that there would be 4,000 cubic meters to excavate, at a cost of $2.50 per cubic meter, and that the cost of raising her and putting her ashore would be $2,000. They also estimate that they could raise a section 45 feet in length along the part now projecting above the water for $5,000. And I am of the opinion that for $2,000 that part projecting above the bottom and a considerable portion adjacent thereto could be raised.

12. In addition to the cost above enumerated there would be the cost of conveying the material recovered to the United States. The local agencies could give me no data on this problem, but I am in communication with agents in Malta and Naples and will make this question subject of future report.

ITALIAN GOVERNMENT WOULD APPROVE.

13. I am of the opinion that, if it is the department's wish to raise her, or any part of her, it can best be done by contract with the above-mentioned firm. They are, so far as I can learn, the only company there with facilities necessary to undertake it. They can take care of such parts as are recovered until such time as they can be shipped to the United States, and above all they can interfere and forbid the work being carried on by any other company on the strength of the fact that they are under contract to fill in that part of the harbor where the wreck lies, and may commence at that spot whenever they choose.

14. As a matter of fact, they will not, in the ordinary course of events, reach the spot where the Philadelphia lies for a long time, and if they take the contract to raise her, they would not undertake it until next February, because in this season of storms the work would surely be interfered with and most likely would prove to be impracticable. Once started on the work, they estimate that it would require two weeks to raise the whole wreck, and a less time for a less part.

15. In case it is wished to attempt to raise the wreck, there will be, I believe, practically no difficulty in obtaining the necessary permission from the Italian Government. In fact, the idea of our raising her has produced a very favorable impression not only at Tripoli, but throughout Italy.

16. I await instructions before proceeding further in the matter.

R. DRACE WHITE.

HEROISM AND GALLANTRY VERSUS MATERIALISM.

The remains of Stephen Decatur repose in the old third district of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor to represent in Congress. I have often stood by the monument reared in his honor by the citizens of Philadelphia, and upon which the garlands of admiration and esteem are annually laid by the patriotic women of the Stephen Decatur Chapter, Daughters of 1812, and have wondered if succeeding generations have fully appreciated the value of the life and services of this brave man. He was one of those heroes around whose memory cluster the hallowed traditions which lift us above the field of materialism. Indeed, the story of his life and that of the frigate Philadelphia tend to renew our faith in the American Navy and in the patriotism and fighting qualities of our officers and enlisted men. It does us good to preach the heroism of Stephen Decatur. It aids us to a better understanding of the purposes of those who engage their services in the dangerous work of the Army or the Navy. And when we consider it in relation to more recent heroes of the Navy of the United States it helps us to forget that the world of peace is selfish and overdone in money getting.

CUSHING AND HOBSON IN DECATUR CLASS.

The century just closed gave us three heroes of the Decatur type—Decatur himself, Cushing, and HOBSON. There have been many others, participants in the various wars in which our country engaged from 1800 to 1900, but in no three particulars are the exploits of heroism so easily comparable as in the instances of Decatur, Cushing, and HOBSON. With respect to personal daring and bravery, in the execution of well-conceived but hazardous plans, there is very little difference between Decatur's burning of the Philadelphia in 1804, Cushing's blowing up of the Albemarle in 1864, and HOBSON's sinking of the Merrimac in 1898. Each invaded hostile territory and shared personally the perils of the brave handful of men who accompanied the expedition. Each succeeded in his undertaking, and thus added to the honor and glory of American arms.

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that if we can freshen the American mind and fire the American heart by the recovery of relics of the historic frigate Philadelphia it would amply repay the small expenditure that is contemplated. The bringing back to America of whatever may be found of this famous old fighting craft would add to our respect for the flag of our common country and intensify our appreciation of and regard for its fighting men. If the recovery of no more than one of the 44 original cannon is effected, it will be worth all the money that is asked for the purpose.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, Oklahoma bears burden of the Nation in the loss of school lands, in the insignificant amount received from the percentage on sale of public lands and in enormous loss of revenue by reason of vast area of nontaxable Indian lands. To remove this burden from the people of Oklahoma I have introduced three bills, to which I wish to call the attention of the House at this time.

Each one of these bills provides for a large appropriation to the State of Oklahoma. These appropriations are to pay to the State of Oklahoma certain amounts which I maintain are justly due the State on account of matters growing out of the terms and conditions under which Oklahoma was admitted as a State into the Union. At the outset, I will state that I do not charge that Congress intentionally did an injustice to Oklahoma. Nothing I shall say will be intended as a criticism upon the Committee on Territories in 1906, that had the Oklahoma Enabling Act in charge, and especially nothing I say must be regarded as, in any way, a criticism upon the gentleman from Michigan, the Hon. EDWARD L. HAMILTON, the chairman of the Committee on Territories at the time. The people of Oklahoma are greatly indebted to him for services rendered, and our people hold him in the highest esteem. And finally nothing I say is intended as a reflection upon the work of my colleague, Mr. MCGUIRE, who was the delegate from Oklahoma Territory, at the time the Oklahoma Statehood bill was passed. Rather would I praise him for his splendid work in connection with Oklahoma's statehood act.

THIRTY-ONE MILLION ASKED FOR.

The three bills which I have introduced carry a total appropriation to the State of Oklahoma of over $31,000,000. This is a large sum of money. I have not introduced these bills hastily. I have given the matter the most careful consideration. I have acted only after I concluded that each of the claims have real merit, and that as a Representative from the State of Oklahoma my duty to the people and the taxpayers of that State demanded that I should introduce these bills, and with whatever ability I may have press them for favorable consideration before the Congress of the United States, the only tribunal that has jurisdiction to pass upon these claims.

GENERAL STATEMENT.

In the act approved June 16, 1906, which provided for the admission of Oklahoma as a State into the Union, Congress appropriated $5,000,000 to the State of Oklahoma for public-school purposes, in lieu of sections 16 and 36 in each township in the Indian Territory, which had been conveyed to certain Indian Tribes and were not therefore available as a grant to the State for public-school purposes. In round numbers, sections 16 and 36 in the Indian Territory comprised about 1,100,000 acres of land. Congress allowed the State about $4.60 per acre for these lands. This, I contend, was only about one-third their value. The amount of the appropriation should have been equal to the value of these lands. I maintain, therefore, that the people of Oklahoma have a just claim against the United States for the difference between the $5,000,000 and the real value of these lands, which I estimate was about $16,000,000, or $15 per acre. This, in brief, is the basis for my bill (H. R. 27950), which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Oklahoma $11,000,000, and makes appropriation therefor.

PER CENT OF PROCEEDS OF SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Beginning with the act of Congress passed in 1802, which provided for the admission of the State of Ohio into the Union, Congress has granted to all the public-land States an amount equal to 5 per cent on the net proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within the State. With the exception of Oklahoma, all these public-land States were admitted, early in their history, when the population was small and when only a small part of the public lands lying within the States had been entered. While the percentage, except as to Nebraska and Arizona, was granted on sales subsequent to statehood, in effect the States received a percentage on practically all the lands within the States, as prior to statehood comparatively few of the lands had been entered.

Not so with Oklahoma. In the first place, Congress had conveyed all the public lands in the Indian Territory to the Indians, constituting about half the area of the State. This reduced by half the amount which Oklahoma would have otherwise received. In the second place, at the time of statehood, in what was formerly Oklahoma Territory, nearly all the public lands had been entered and final proof made thereon. As a result, this grant to Oklahoma of an amount equal to 5 per cent on the sales of public lands is insignificant compared with the amount received by the 28 other public-land States. To correct this injustice, I have introduced H. R. 28669, which provides in substance that Oklahoma shall have 5 per cent on sales of public lands lying within the State, sold either prior or subsequent to date of statehood.

NONTAXABLE INDIAN LANDS.

The most important of all these three bills is H. R. 28670, which provides for an appropriation of $20,000,000 to the State of Oklahoma, payable in 16 annual payments of $1,250,000 each.

This claim is based upon the proposition that the Indian lands in Oklahoma are nontaxable by virtue of stipulations in treaties made by the United States with the Indians; that the Federal Government has no power or authority to exempt from taxation land within a State, after the United States had sold or disposed of the lands, except by consent of the State, and except on terms and conditions prescribed by the State and upon payment of such consideration as shall be satisfactory to the Sate; and, finally, that to provide the Indians with nontaxable lands is a duty belonging to the Federal and not the State government, and that whatever it costs to provide nontaxable lands for the Indians should be paid by the National Government and not by the people of the State governments. The object of this $20,000,000 appropriation is, in a measure at least, to pay to the State of Oklahoma and the various county, township, and school district governments for loss in revenue from nontaxable Indian lands.

SCHOOL LANDS APPROPRIATED FOR NATIONAL USE.

It is important that we first clearly comprehend the fact that the Federal Government used the public lands in the Indian Territory for a national purpose. To all intents and purposes these lands were used by the Government to pay a national debt. The United States in effect sold these lands to the Indians, and received a valuable consideration therefor. The Indians secured these lands through contract, agreement, and treaty. The Indians paid a consideration therefor, they relinquished homes elsewhere, or otherwise made concessions which were valuable to the Nation.

But, leaving out the question of consideration, in dealing with the Indian the United States had a duty to perform, an obligation to discharge, a responsibility to meet. In discharging what was clearly a national duty, a national obligation, a national responsibility, the public lands in the Indian Territory were conveyed to the Indians.

The public school lands in the Indian Territory, solemnly dedicated to the sacred purpose of promoting education among the people of the State, were diverted from this great purpose and converted by the United States to another and entirely different purpose. These lands belonged to the State; they were used by the Nation. Dedicated solely to the use of the people of the State, they were appropriated for the use and benefit of all the people of the United States. Deprived of these lands, the people of the State have the right to expect full compensation therefor. If full compensation is not made to the people of the State for the loss of these lands then the Federal Government will be compelling the people of Oklahoma to pay, as a price for statehood, a debt that clearly belonged to the Nation and should have been paid by all the 93,000,000 people of the United States.

THREE GENERAL PROPOSITIONS.

The arguments in support of the bill (H. R. 27950) to appropriate $11,000,000 to compensate the State of Oklahoma for difference between the value of school lands in the Indian Territory and the $5,000,000 appropriated, I will present under three general propositions.

First. By virtue of what might be called the common law of the country—a law established by more than a century of precedent, custom, and usage, reenforced by a well-defined national policy—the people of Oklahoma were entitled to sections 16 and 36 in each township in the Indian Territory for public school purposes, or in lieu thereof an amount of money equal to their reasonable value at date of statehood.

Second. Other public-land States, in the number of acres granted to them for public school purposes, and in the per capita grant to such States, based upon population in 1910, and also in the per capita grant based upon school population, received vastly larger grants of land for public school purposes than did Oklahoma.

Third. The 1,100,000 acres of public school lands in the Indian Territory were reasonably worth about $15 per acre—or in the aggregate about $16,000,000—or about $11,000,000 more than the $5,000,000 granted in the enabling act.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, does the gentleman, in referring to lost school lands, mean by that sections 16 and 36 in the Indian Territory part of Oklahoma.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I do.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course, to Oklahoma, as distinct from the Indian Territory, sections 16 and 36 were given, were they not?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. They were.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Did not Oklahoma Territory get a greater quantity of land than two sections in a township?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Not for public-school purposes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What was it for?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Oklahoma received certain grants for the higher educational institutions, certain grants for the public-building fund.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Were not some of those grants made upon the express condition or because of the fact that Oklahoma would not receive sections 16 and 36 in what was the Indian Territory?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I think not.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. For a question, certainly.

Mr. CARTER. For a short statement. These land grants, as I remember, were made prior to the time when the enabling act was passed.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Do you mean the grants to the Indians?

Mr. CARTER. The land grants to the State for all kinds of school purposes were made prior to the time the enabling act was passed.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. When the lands were opened to settlement the school lands were reserved. The actual grant—the legal conveyance—was by grant in the statehood act.

Mr. CARTER. The point I want to make is this: The grant of each of these sections was made for school purposes to the Territory of Oklahoma prior to the time of statehood. The grants were made, in other words, when the opening of the reservations came about. Now—just a moment, if the gentleman will permit me—at the time these openings were had no one could say that Indian Territory was to be any part of the new State of Oklahoma; in fact, a very strong effort was being made to make separate States of Indian Territory and Oklahoma, so any land grants which might have been made at that time to Oklahoma Territory could not have been given in lieu of any conditions that existed in the Indian Territory prior to statehood.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is correct.

Mr. CARTER. Is not that correct, I will ask my friend from Oklahoma?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is correct; yes.

Mr. CARTER rose.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would like to yield to my colleague, but it will take all my time to go over the ground I wish to cover.

Mr. CARTER. Just a question. I desire to ask the gentleman if he arrived at the acreage and figures given by calculating sections 16 and 36?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; I estimate the number of acres comprised in sections 16 and 36 in the Indian Territory.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. For just a moment.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman state what disposition the State of Oklahoma made of this $5,000,000? Did it go to the public-school fund?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. It went to the public-school fund.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman state whether or not he has made any inquiry to ascertain the average price the other States received for their public-school lands?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will come to that after a while.

Mr. MURDOCK. How about Kansas?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Kansas received 2,876,124 acres.

Mr. MURDOCK. However, we did not get the $5,000,000.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Kansas received 500,000 acres of public lands for internal improvements, which I think went to your school fund. Your State also received other large grants, which I shall later refer to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can the gentleman make a comparison between the school funds resulting from the Government gratuity?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I expected that question to arise. Some of the States have lost much of their school funds. There are instances of mismanagement. But should the grant to Oklahoma for public-school purposes be measured by mistakes made by the people or public officers of the older States? Certainly not. Oklahoma is entitled to the grant of the regular school lands given to other States, or their equivalent in cash. The mistakes of others should be a warning to the people of Oklahoma, but should not be used as an excuse for limiting the grant, either in lands or in money.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. The State of Kansas was not brought into the Union with one-half of its lands nontaxable?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No. I will come to that directly.

USAGE AND PRECEDENT SUPPORT CLAIM.

Oklahoma's claim to school lands in the Indian Territory is sustained by a full century of precedent, practice, usage, and custom.

The precedent for granting certain lands in each township for public-school purposes antedates the adoption of the Constitution and the organization of the Federal Government thereunder. In 1785 the Congress adopted an ordinance providing for the survey of the territory northwest of the Ohio River. This ordinance declared that lot 16 should be reserved for public-school purposes. In 1787, two years later, Congress passed another ordinance providing for the government of the Northwest Territory. This ordinance designated certain articles therein which should be regarded as articles of compact between the Original States and the State and the people of the Northwest Territory, which articles should remain unalterable except by common consent. One of these articles declared that—

Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

Thus our forefathers, 128 years ago—before the adoption of the Constitution—before the organization of the Government thereunder—established a precedent and inaugurated a national policy which have been followed ever since, and which have been potent factors in the spread of knowledge, in the promotion of education, in the enlightenment of our citizenship, and in adding strength, greatness, and glory to our country.

In 1802 Congress passed an act for the admission of Ohio as a State into the Union. This act granted section 16 in each township for public-school purposes.

From 1802 to 1848—a period of 46 years—in admitting public-land State Congress uniformly granted to the States section 16 in each township for public-school purposes.

In 1848 a new precedent was established—a new policy was adopted. The grant for public schools was enlarged. In that year the State of Oregon was admitted to the Union under an enabling act which granted both sections 16 and 36 in each township for the use of public schools.

The Oregon enabling act became a model for subsequent statehood acts. For from 1848 down to 1913—two-thirds of a century—in admitting public-land States into the Union Congress has followed the Oregon act and granted to the new States sections 16 and 36 in each township for public-school purposes, except that Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico were granted four sections in each township for public schools.

OKLAHOMA RECEIVES LESS THAN OTHER STATES.

The number of acres of land granted to Oklahoma for public-school purposes is not one-third the average number of acres granted to the various States admitted to the Union since 1848.

I have prepared a table showing the number of acres of land granted to the public-land States admitted since 1848 for public-school purposes. This table shows the population of these States in 1910, with the per capita grant to these States. The table is as follows:

Table showing number of acres the several States received from sections 16 and 36, and Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico with sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, with population of States in 1910, and number of acres per capita.

State.	Acres.	Population.	Per capita.
Utah	6,007,182	373,351	16
Montana	5,102,107	376,053	13.5
New Mexico	4,309,369	327,301	13.4
Arizona	4,050,346	204,354	28.8
Nevada	3,985,422	81,875	48.6
Colorado	3,715,555	799,024	4.6
Oregon	3,387,520	672,765	5.03
Wyoming	3,368,924	145,965	23.6
Idaho	3,063,271	325,594	9.4
Kansas	2,876,124	1,690,949	1.7
South Dakota	2,813,511	583,888	4.8
Nebraska	2,637,155	1,192,214	2.2
North Dakota	2,531,200	577,056	4.3
Washington	2,448,675	1,141,990	2.1
Oklahoma	1,276,204	1,657,155	.77
Total number of acres	51,572,565

Average acres for each State, 3,438,171.
Acres granted to Oklahoma, 1,276,204.

Utah received 6,007,128 acres; Montana received 5,102,107 acres. Arizona and New Mexico each received over 4,000,000 acres. Colorado, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, and Wyoming each received over 3,000,000 acres; Kansas received 2,876,124 acres; South Dakota, 2,813,511 acres; Nebraska, 2,637,155; North Dakota, 2,531,100; and Washington, 2,488,675 acres. Oklahoma received 1,276,520 acres.

Utah received the largest acreage for public-school purposes, Oklahoma the smallest. In acreage Utah's grant was more than four times that of Oklahoma. The average acreage granted to these States was 3,438,171 acres, three times the acreage received by Oklahoma.

PER CAPITA GRANT.

The number of acres per capita granted to the people of Oklahoma for common-school purposes is only one-sixteenth the per capita grant to the people of the other States for the same purpose.

The per capita grant for common-school purposes to the various States is as follows:

Nevada, 48.6 acres; Arizona, 28.8 acres; Wyoming, 23.6 acres; Utah, 16 acres; Montana, 13.5 acres; New Mexico, 13.4 acres; Idaho, 9.4 acres; Oregon, 5.03 acres; South Dakota, 4.8 acres; Colorado, 4.6 acres; North Dakota, 4.3 acres; Nebraska, 2.2 acres; Washington, 2.1 acres; Kansas, 1.7 acres; and Oklahoma, only 0.7 of an acre.

Nevada received the largest per capita grant, 48.6 acres. Oklahoma received the smallest per capita grant, seven-tenths of an acre. The per capita grant to Nevada was 70 times the per capita grant to Oklahoma. The average per capita grant to the various States was 11.2 acres. The average per capita grant to these States was 16 times the per capita acreage granted to Oklahoma.

If this is fair and equitable, then you must say that 1 acre of land in Oklahoma is worth 16 acres of average land in 14 of the best States west of the Mississippi River.

PER CAPITA GRANT BASED ON SCHOOL POPULATION.

The number of acres per capita granted to Oklahoma, based upon the number of persons of school age in 1910, is only one twenty-fourth the per capita grant to the other 14 States based upon school population.

I have prepared a table showing the number of acres of land granted for public-school purposes, the school population based upon the census of 1910, and the per capita grant to each State based upon the number of persons of school age in said States in 1910.

The table is as follows:

Table showing grant per capita according to the number of persons of school age in certain States in 1910.

States.	Acres.	School population.	Per capita.
Utah	6,007,182	121,016	49.6
Montana	5,102,107	93,771	54.4
New Mexico	4,309,369	105,403	40.8
Arizona	4,050,346	56,897	71
Nevada	3,985,422	16,132	247
Colorado	3,715,555	215,940	17.2
Oregon	3,387,520	175,386	19.3
Wyoming	3,368,924	35,776	94.1
Idaho	3,063,271	96,819	31.6
Kansas	2,876,124	515,156	5.5
South Dakota	2,813,511	183,979	15.2
Nebraska	2,637,155	373,868	7
North Dakota	2,531,200	183,336	13.8
Washington	2,448,675	293,478	8.3
Oklahoma	1,276,204	566,323	2.2

Average grant per capita on school population, excluding Oklahoma, 48.2.
Per capita grant to school children in Oklahoma, 2.2.

Nevada leads the list of States with 247 acres for each person of school age in the State in 1910. Oklahoma is at the bottom of the list with only 2.2 acres to each person of school age in the State in 1910. Wyoming follows Nevada with 94.1 acres for every child of school age. Arizona has 71 acres per capita for her children of school age. Montana has 54.4 acres for every one of her school children. Utah comes next with 49.6 acres to each school child. New Mexico has a per capita acreage for every one of her school children of 40.8 acres. Idaho has for each school child in the State 31.6 acres. For every school child Oregon has 19.3 acres; Colorado, 17.2 acres; South Dakota, 15.2 acres; North Dakota, 13.8 acres; Washington, 8.3 acres; Nebraska, 7 acres; and Kansas, 5.5 acres.

The average grant per capita to the 15 States in this list, excluding Oklahoma, based upon the school population, is 48.2. The average per capita grant to these 15 States, based upon the school population in 1910, was 24 times the per capita grant to Oklahoma.

$5,000,000 LESS THAN ONE-THIRD VALUE OF LANDS.

The $5,000,000 in cash granted the State of Oklahoma in lieu of sections 16 and 36 in the Indian Territory was not more than one-third the value of these lands.

What were these lands worth? What gives value to land? Soil, climate, season, transportation facilities, markets, society, schools, and churches.

These lands were located in an excellent climate. The soil was rich, fertile, and productive. The seasons were favorable, the normal rainfall was ample.

These lands were not in an unpopulated country remote from society, civilization, commerce, trade, and business. Six hundred and eighteen thousand one hundred and fifteen people were already in the Territory. Twelve of the States in 1910 had a less number of inhabitants. The two Territories in 1907 had a population of nearly 1,500,000 people.

Railroads were already built, markets were accessible, the cost of transportation reasonable. Flourishing towns and villages dotted the land. There were many thriving cities with populations ranging from one to fifteen thousand.

School privileges were very inadequate in the country, but the towns and cities had established creditable public schools; other institutions of learning had been founded; churches had been built; charitable and fraternal orders had been organized; and already the people had laid well the foundation for the highest type of society and civilization.

Great material progress had been made. Agriculture, mining, manufacturing, trade, transportation, and commerce were flourishing.

The Territory was surrounded by great, populous, wealthy States that had attained a high degree of development. On the south was Texas, on the east Arkansas, on the north Kansas, and on the west the best developed part of Oklahoma Territory, when lands were selling on the market at from $20 to $50 per acre.

The Territory was rich in minerals. Nowhere was there a better prospect for industrial development, for growth in its towns and cities, for increase in population, and wealth, and for rapid rise in the value of lands.

Who will say that these fertile lands thus situated and surrounded—located in the very heart of civilization, with markets, transportation, industry, population, schools, and churches—were worth only $4.62 per acre?

The assessor of Oklahoma in 1909 placed a value on these lands. They assessed Oklahoma lands for taxation in 1909 at $12.38 per acre. This meant that in their judgment these lands were worth from $18 to $25 per acre.

The United States through its Census Bureau valued the lands in Oklahoma at $22.49 per acre.

In 1889 and 1890 Congress placed an estimate upon the school lands in a number of the Western States. The enabling acts admitting North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington, in 1889, and Idaho and Wyoming, in 1890, granted these States sections 16 and 36. In this act Congress placed a limitation on the grant, prohibiting these States from selling any of these lands, even the poorest section, at less than $10 per acre. This was equivalent to saying to the people of these States, "The poorest of these lands are worth to you $10 per acre, and Congress, for the protection of the taxpayers and school children of the State, prohibits you from selling any of your lands at less than their value, and $10 per acre shall be the minimum price at which any of these lands shall be sold."

But, lo, and behold! When Congress a few years later came to compensate Oklahoma for school lands which the Nation had appropriated for another purpose—a national purpose—Congress said to the people of Oklahoma, "Your lands are worth only $4.62 per acre."

If it were unwise for the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, and Wyoming to sell their school lands for less than $10 per acre as the minimum price, certainly the people of Oklahoma ought not to accept $4.62 per acre for her school lands without a protest and without an appeal to the National Congress for justice in a matter that vitally affects her people.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not think, as a matter of fact, that the school lands in the States he refers to are actually worth anything like $10 an acre, does he?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, I am only stating what the judgment of Congress was as to the value of those lands.

Mr. HELGESEN. Let me tell the gentleman that in North Dakota they are worth vastly more than $10 an acre, and they have sold for more.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am glad to have the testimony of the gentleman from North Dakota as to the value of school lands in that State.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is talking about the value at the time of the grant. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman says that the United States Census Bureau estimated the value of lands in Oklahoma at the time Oklahoma came into the Union at something over $22 an acre.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No; I said in 1910.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, in 1910. Can the gentleman state what was the value of the land in some of the other States that he has mentioned at the time they were admitted; for instance, Nevada, Wyoming, and Montana?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I did not look this up. I do not suppose the land in those States on the average is worth as much as land in some other States.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do you not think that at the time they were admitted $4.60 an acre would have been a pretty good price?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am candid in answering this question in the negative. These Oklahoma lands at that time could have been sold wholesale to a syndicate or corporation for $15 an acre. Why, Mr. Chairman, not only was the surface of these lands worth that, but it was known that these lands were rich in mineral. It was known that the new State would develop rapidly.

PER CENT ON PROCEEDS OF SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The second bill which I have introduced and to which I desire to call the attention of the House is H. R. 28669. This bill carries an appropriation of $500,000, or so much as may be necessary. This bill authorizes the payment to the State of Oklahoma of an amount of money equal to 5 per cent of the proceeds of the sale of public lands lying within what was formerly Oklahoma Territory on sales made between April 22, 1889, the date the first lands were opened to entry, and November 16, 1907, the date Oklahoma became a State in the Union.

The object of this bill is to equalize the amount received by the State of Oklahoma from a percentage on the proceeds of the sale of public lands with an amount received by 28 of the States of the Union under a similar provision.

OKLAHOMA'S GRANT INSIGNIFICANT.

The amount received by Oklahoma from the grant of 5 per cent on the net proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within the State is only one-eighth the average amount received by 28 other States under a similar grant.

I have prepared a table showing the States which have received this grant, the amount received by each State for the fiscal year 1912, and the total amount received by each State up to that time.

The table is as follows:

Amounts accrued and paid to States for purposes of education, or of making public roads and improvements, on account of grants of 2, 3, and 5 per cent of net proceeds of sales of public lands lying within said States.

Seven of these States, viz, Alabama, California, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Mississippi, and Missouri, have each received from this fund in excess of $1,000,000. Ohio has received $999,351.01. Oregon has received $715,016.11. Wisconsin, North Dakota, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Iowa have received in excess of $500,000. Montana and Louisiana have each received $400,000. Washington, South Dakota, and Arkansas have each received over $300,000.

In comparison with these large amounts received by the various States, ranging from $300,000 to over $1,000,000, Oklahoma has received the insignificant sum of $59,117.89. This sum can never be materially increased, because the public lands in Oklahoma have been exhausted, final proofs have been made, and patents issued on practically all of our public lands. On the lands not yet patented there will be very few sales; the most of our settlers will acquire title under the three and five year law. Under this grant, as construed by the department, Oklahoma will never receive to exceed $75,000.

Each of the 28 States have received under this grant an average of $572,655. In round numbers, each of the States have received 10 times the amount received by Oklahoma. Many of the States in the list will receive under this grant large sums in the future, because large tracts of public lands in the State are still unentered.

The per capita grant received by the 14 public-land States that have been admitted since 1848, excluding Arizona, which has just been admitted, based upon the population of 1910, is as follows: Wyoming, $1.44; Oregon, $1.06; Montana, $1.06; North Dakota, 91 cents; Idaho, 74 cents; Kansas, 66 cents; South Dakota, 58 cents; Colorado, 57 cents; Nebraska, 47 cents; Nevada, 39 cents; New Mexico, 36 cents; Washington, 33 cents; Utah, 22 cents; and Oklahoma, 3 cents.

The largest amount per capita is $1.44, received by the people of Wyoming. The smallest amount per capita was 3 cents, received by the people of Oklahoma.

The average amount received per capita by these 14 States, excluding Oklahoma, is 62 cents. In other words, the average amount per capita received by the people of these 13 States is 20 times the amount per capita received by the people of Oklahoma.

Taking these same 13 public-land States, which have been admitted since 1848, excluding Arizona, the amount received per capita, based upon the number of persons of school age according to the census of 1910, is as follows: Wyoming, $5.96; Montana, $4.31; Oregon, $4.08; North Dakota, $2.87; Idaho, $2.49; Kansas, $2.18; Colorado, $2.16; Nevada, $1.99; Nebraska, $1.41; Washington, $1.35; New Mexico, $1.14; South Dakota, $1.13; Utah, 67 cents; and Oklahoma, 10 cents.

The largest amount received by any State from the percentage on the proceeds of the sale of public lands was Wyoming, $5.96. The smallest amount was received by Oklahoma, 10 cents per capita. The average per capita received by these 13 States was $2.44.

In other words the average amount received by these States per capita is 24 times the amount received per capita by the people of Oklahoma from this grant.

The discrimination against Oklahoma in this grant is also seen in the amount received from each State for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912. For that year South Dakota received $44,582.90, Montana received $37,598.88, Wyoming received $23,870.07, North Dakota recevied $23,564.36, California received $17,354.82, Colorado received $15,355.24, and Oregon received $15,328.30, but Oklahoma received from this fund during that year only $3,161.83.

The amount received by the State of Oklahoma compared with the total amount received, or the per capita amount, according to the population of 1910, or based upon the school population of the various States, is so insignificantly small as to make the grant to Oklahoma practically no grant at all.

What is the explanation of this? In the first place, Congress conveyed practically one-half of all the public lands in Oklahoma to the various Indian tribes of the Indian Territory. In theory the National Government received a consideration for these lands, but under the grant Oklahoma, of course, receives no percentage thereon. Secondly, before statehood the public lands lying within the State had been largely already patented. Thirdly, as a rule the settlers of Oklahoma did not purchase their land under the commutation act, but acquired title after a five years' residence.

The department has construed the provision in the Oklahoma enabling act providing for this grant to apply only to lands sold subsequent to statehood. The bill which I have introduced (H. R. 28669) grants to the State a sum equal to 5 per cent of the net proceeds on all sales from public lands from April 22, 1889, to November 16, 1907, the day Oklahoma became a State. In effect my bill grants to the State a sum equal to 5 per cent on the sale of public lands lying within the State sold either before or subsequent to statehood.

In all the 29 States receiving this grant the provision in the enabling act states specifically either that the per cent shall apply only to lands sold subsequent to statehood or a definite date is fixed on or about statehood from which the State should receive a percentage on the proceeds of all sales. The Nebraska enabling act is an exception, in this, that it grants the per cent of sales of public land both "prior and subsequent" to statehood. New Mexico was also granted this percentage on sales made while a Territory.

The Oklahoma enabling act is an exception to all the others. The language is indefinite and uncertain. It provides that there shall be paid to the State "an amount equal to 5 per cent of the proceeds of the sale of public lands lying within the State." The department has construed this language to limit the grant to sales of public lands made subsequent to statehood. The department, I think, is wrong in this construction. The grant was philanthropic in its nature, and should be construed liberally in favor of Oklahoma.

It may be suggested that Oklahoma is too late; that the people have slept on their rights. Not so. Congress itself has made a precedent for correcting a mistake or injustice relating to such a grant.

California was admitted into the Union by an act approved September 9, 1850. The act made no grant to the State of any percentage on the proceeds of the sale of its public lands. Fifty-six years passed away. Finally, by an act approved June 27, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 518), Congress granted to California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands from date of statehood. Under this act California has received already $1,080,053.26, and from the sales of land in 1912 received $17,354.82.

Congress has been just and generous to California. I have faith that Congress will treat Oklahoma with the same degree of justice and generosity, and make an appropriation which will, in a measure at least, equalize the amount received by Oklahoma under this grant with the money that has been received by 28 States of this Union under a similar grant.

Mr. HELGESEN. How far back did it go in California?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. It went back to the time that it was admitted into the Union as a State.

Mr. HELGESEN. Five per cent on the lands from the beginning?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Went back to the sale of lands from the beginning—from the admission of the State in 1850.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the California proposition is very interesting. Will the gentleman explain to the House whether the California payment went through Congress as a separate measure, or was it on some appropriation bill?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That California bill went through as a separate measure, considered by itself, which showed it had the due consideration of the House.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman state to the House what Oklahoma has done with its school lands in what was old Oklahoma Territory? I understand there is something about a million——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Most of those lands have not been sold, but they are under lease.

Mr. MILLER. And still remain intact?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. They still remain intact. The common-school lands have not been sold.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. A portion of them have been sold and a portion have not been sold.

Mr. MILLER. Have arrangements been made to put them into a permanent fund?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

COMPENSATION FOR NONTAXABLE LANDS.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The third bill which I have introduced, to which I wish to call the attention of the House at this time, is H. R. 28670.

The bill is entitled "A bill to pay the State of Oklahoma $20,000,000 in lieu of taxes on lands and other property within the State, sold and disposed of by the United States under terms and conditions prohibiting the State from taxing the same."

The National Government, through treaty stipulations, has placed a large portion of the lands in Oklahoma in a position of being exempt from taxation. I have reached the conclusion that the State is entitled to compensation for loss of revenue occasioned thereby, and that no adequate compensation has been made. The object of this bill is to require the National Government to make such appropriation as will at least in a fair measure compensate the State and its various civil subdivisions for loss of taxes upon nontaxable Indian lands. The bill appropriates $20,000,000, payable in 16 annual installments, to be distributed to the State, counties, and school districts, as their interests may appear, based upon loss of revenue.

OKLAHOMA BEARS NATIONAL BURDEN.

The United States in asking Oklahoma to provide nontaxable homes for more than one-third of the Indians of the United States is placing upon the 1,700,000 people of the State of Oklahoma a duty, an obligation, a responsibility, a burden, that belongs to all the 93,000,000 people of the United States.

Under the Constitution of the United States the Federal Government has no right, power, or authority, without the consent of the State and except upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the State, and except upon the payment to the State of such consideration as may be agreed to by the State, to exempt from taxation, for any period of time, any lands which have been sold or disposed of by the National Government.

Cooley, in his work on "Taxation" (third edition, p. 136), discussing the exemption of public lands from State taxation, says:

> The disability remains effective until the United States shall have made sale or other disposition of the lands, but it then terminates, notwithstanding the title may not have passed by the actual execution and delivery of a patent.

In the Ohio enabling act Congress made three grants to the State—section 16 for schools, certain salt springs with contiguous land, and a per cent on net sales of public lands. Following these grants was this proviso:

Provided always, That three foregoing propositions herein offered are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress from and after the 30th day of June next shall be, and remain, exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale.

The Indiana enabling act, passed in 1816, made certain grants to the State on the express condition that the State would not tax lands which the United States had sold for a period of five years after date of sale. Four grants were made to Illinois on the express condition that the State would exempt from taxation lands sold by the United States for a period of five years, and exempt certain bounty lands granted to soldiers while the same should be held by the patentees or their heirs.

The enabling acts admitting Iowa, Alabama, Arkansas, and other States contain similar provisions.

Indeed, this proviso requiring the States to exempt from taxation, for a definite period of time, certain lands which the United States had sold or disposed of was inserted in all the enabling acts of those States in which there were lands which the United States desired should be exempt from taxation after statehood.

The grant to the States of 5 per cent on the sales of public lands apparently was intended as a special consideration to the States and the civil subdivisions thereof for loss of revenue on lands which had been disposed of by the United States and which the National Government desired should be exempt from taxation. In admitting Oklahoma Congress apparently gave no consideration to the question of compensating the State for exempting from taxation lands which the Government had conveyed to the Indians. Certainly there is nothing in the enabling act specifically referring thereto. There is nothing in the enabling act—no grant, gratuity, gift, or donation to the State—that may fairly be construed as a consideration to the people of the State for loss of revenue from lands no longer the property of the United States, but which had been made exempt from taxation by stipulations in treaties made by the Federal Government with the Indians.

In other words, the Federal Government has never claimed the right to exempt from State taxation property which it had disposed of.

The Federal Government has always conceded the right of the State to demand a consideration for exempting from taxation any lands or other property sold or disposed of by the United States.

The State therefore has the right to demand a full consideration for exempting from taxation property which has been made nontaxable by law, treaty, or other act of the United States.

I frankly admit the the people of Oklahoma in their constitution have by express terms exempted from taxation "such property as may be exempt by reasons of treaty stipulations existing between the Indians and the United States Government or by Federal laws during the force and effect of such treaties or Federal laws."

This provision is mere surplusage. Without such a provision in the State constitution the State of Oklahoma could not have taxed the lands which were exempt from taxation by reason of treaties made between the Indians and the United States. The people of Oklahoma might any day repeal this provision in their constitution. Still the State could not tax these Indian lands. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that these lands were exempt from taxation and alienation by virtue of treaty stipulations, and that Congress itself was powerless by any statute to subject the property to taxation.

There is no specific provision in the enabling act requiring the people of Oklahoma to waive the right to tax lands belonging to the Indians. There is not a word in the enabling act expressing any special consideration to the people of Oklahoma for waiver of power to tax Indian property. The enabling act contains nothing which may be regarded as a consideration or compensation to the State for loss of revenue from nontaxable Indian property.

The State of Oklahoma received only such grants and gratuities as had been given to all the public-land States. Indeed, I have shown that, on the whole, the grants to Oklahoma, all things considered, have not been commensurate with grants to other States.

Yet Oklahoma is the only State where Indian property exempt from taxation is a matter which to any great degree seriously embarrasses the State and local governments.

It is clear, therefore, that the people of Oklahoma have received no consideration for exempting Indian property from taxation, and that the United States has not compensated the people of Oklahoma for loss in revenue by reason of such exempt property.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 14 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I want to make the suggestion that at the time Oklahoma was admitted into the Union the Curtis Act of April 26, 1906, which provided that all lands from which restrictions were removed should become taxable, had been passed 18 months. Since that time we have had the decision in the case of Choate versus Trapp and others, which takes us back to the old agreement of 1902 and provides that some of the lands shall not be taxable until they are transferred and others nontaxable in perpetuity. So at the time we voted on our constitution the validity of the Curtis Act had not been questioned, and we very naturally expected we would have sufficient taxable values for the necessary governmental expenses.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman state how much the taxes are that are levied now in the State of Oklahoma—what they aggregate?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The total amount?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, it is sufficient.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Are they as much as fifteen or sixteen millions of dollars?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I could not say exactly now; but I am not referring simply to State taxes—to expense of running the State—I am referring to State, county, township, and school districts; to losses sustained by all these governments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. This is one fourth of the land, and if that would produce $4,000,000 in taxation they must have a large tax down there and a large amount of revenue.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am simply giving you a fair estimate of the value of property that is exempt from taxation. Certainly one-third of all our lands are exempt from taxation. One-fourth of all our property is exempt from taxation. I have not the information as to the total amount expended annually by all our governments—State, county, township, and school district—but the State tax is not large compared with the total amount of taxes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. For a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma believe that in good conscience the Government of the United States or the State of Oklahoma should tax Indian lands in the State of Oklahoma?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not. I believe it is the duty of the National Government, it is the duty of the people of this great Nation, to provide that the uneducated, the incompetent, the uncivilized Indian shall have his land and his home free from taxation as long as that condition exists; but, Mr. Chairman, whose duty is it to provide these untaxable homes for the wards of the Nation? Where does the obligation lie; who is responsible for the care and protection, the education and enlightenment of these wards of the Nation? Not Kansas, not New York, not Oklahoma, not any other State. That is a duty, a responsibility, an obligation, a burden which rests upon the United States of America—upon the 93,000,000 people of the United States and not upon the 1,600,000 people of Oklahoma, or upon the people of any other State.

Mr. CAMPBELL. May I ask, Did not these 1,600,000 people go into the State of Oklahoma knowing that they were encroaching upon the last home of the American Indian?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the people of Oklahoma went into that State just like we come to Congress, just like men go to other States. They went there at the invitation of the United States, and the United States had the power and authority to have kept every white man out of that country. We are there to-day as citizens of the United States and as citizens of the State of Oklahoma. We have our own problems to solve, our own burdens to bear. We cheerfully bear our full share of national responsibilities. But we shall not without protest and without appeal for relief bear alone a burden that belongs to the Nation. Mr. Chairman, just yesterday we passed a bill through this House appropriating $7,000,000 for the support of the District of Columbia. Why do we appropriate that large sum—why do we bear half the expense of running the government here for 350,000 people of the city of Washington? One great reason is because here in the National Capital the United States Government has a large amount of property that is exempt from taxation. If we may pay $7,000,000 a year in compensation to these 350,000 people in Washington, D. C., for the exemption of the United States property from taxation, why should not the people of Oklahoma be compensated for loss of revenue occasioned by the exemption from taxation of $300,000,000 worth of property that belong to the Indians, who are the children of the Nation?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I do not know whether I fully understood the gentleman, but as I understand him, his statement is that one-fourth of the taxable land in Oklahoma is nontaxable. I am anxious to get this before the House with its full force, and the gentleman, as usual, states things conservatively. Is it not a fact that in the east end of the State, in what is known as the Five Civilized Tribes country, at the time of statehood a section of country as large as the State of Indiana had not one foot of taxable land outside of the cities?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is true.

Mr. HELGESEN. Is it not also true the Government has removed the restrictions from a great many of these Indians, made them citizens, and made it possible for them to impose burdens upon the white people that they themselves do not share?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The Indians are citizens—may vote and exercise all the privileges of citizenship in our State, and nobody in Oklahoma objects to that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is discussing a very interesting subject, and I want to say that I am in full accord with his proposition as to the obligation of the Government toward some of the States where very large Indian tracts are not taxable; and I would like for the gentleman, if he can, to suggest any remedy that is practicable at this time. In other words, we have a condition confronting us; but is it not too late in those States that are in the position of Oklahoma to receive what perhaps they ought to have had originally?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, it is never too late to do right; it is never too late to do justice. Why should South Dakota and Montana and Arizona and New Mexico and the other Northwestern States which have large amounts of Indian property exempt from taxation bear an undue share of the burden which comes from providing incompetent Indians with homes free from taxation?

AMOUNT OF PROPERTY EXEMPT FROM TAXATION.

Few people realize the enormous value of Indian property in Oklahoma which is exempt from taxation, and it is almost impossible to comprehend the immense loss in revenue thereby occasioned to the State, county, township, and school district governments.

I present a table showing Indian population. The table is as follows:

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

There are in the United States 322,715 Indians; 117,247 of this number are in Oklahoma. We have within our State over one-third of the entire Indian population of the United States; 101,287 of this number belong to the Five Civilized Tribes; 15,960 belong to other tribes. The latter are Indians located in the western half of the State in what was formerly Oklahoma Territory.

Twenty-seven of the States have less than 1,000 Indians; 21 have less than 500 Indians; 7 of the States have less than 100 Indians. The total Indian population of 41 States of the Union is less than the Indian population of Oklahoma. In the amount of its Indian population Oklahoma stands absolutely in a class by itself.

I present table showing distribution of Indian property in the various States. The table is as follows:

In what was formerly the Indian Territory the allotted and unallotted Indian lands comprise 19,134,214 acres. About three-fourths of this vast area is untaxable for a long period of years. In what was formerly Oklahoma Territory there are 3,602,259 acres of untaxable Indian lands. In the entire State about 18,000,000 acres of Indian lands are not taxable. At $15 per acre these lands are worth $270,000,000. This vast estate, made untaxable by laws and treaties of the United States, is equal to about one-fourth of all the taxable property of the State of Oklahoma.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs has made an estimate of the value of all the Indian property in the United States. According to this estimate the Indian property in the United States amounts to $678,564,253. The Indian Bureau values the Indian property in the State of Oklahoma at $267,603,111. Two-fifths of all the Indian property of the United States is in Oklahoma. All the Indian property in 41 States of the Union does not equal the amount of Indian property in the one State of Oklahoma.

If this property were taxed for State, county, township, and school-district purposes at 1½ per cent, it would bring to the State and its various civil subdivisions annually over $4,000,000. At this rate, in the five years which have elapsed since statehood the people have lost in revenue from nontaxable Indian property more than $20,000,000. Congress granted to the people of the State $5,000,000 cash in lieu of public-school lands in the Indian Territory. At 5 per cent annual interest this would bring the State an annual revenue of $250,000. In the meantime the State and its various civil municipalities loses annually $4,000,000 in revenue. They are losing $16 in revenue from nontaxable Indian lands for every dollar in interest they receive from the $5,000,000 cash appropriation. This must go on until the lands may be taxed. The loss which the people of Oklahoma will sustain by reason of nontaxable Indian lands can not, of course, be accurately measured, but the loss will be enormous. In my judgment, when a final accounting is had in the matter of nontaxable Indian lands the people of the State will have lost in revenue above $50,000,000.

We all agree that the lands of the incompetent, uneducated, and uncivilized Indians should be exempted from taxation, but some one must pay for this exemption. To relieve one piece of property from taxation is equivalent to increasing the tax upon all other property. To exempt Indian lands from taxation adds additional taxes to all other lands. Revenue lost from exempted Indian property must be made up by revenue from other property. There is no escape from these conclusions, unless the people submit to an inefficient government and inadequate educational facilities.

This 276,000,000 acres of property in Oklahoma that is exempt from taxation belongs to the Indians. The Indians are wards of the Federal Government—they are the children of the Nation. The care of Indians is a national duty. To provide them with nontaxable property is an obligation that rests upon the National Government. It is the business of the Nation to provide the Indians with nontaxable property. The cost of providing this nontaxable property is a debt the Nation owes and a debt the Nation should pay. The cost of exempting the Indian from any of the ordinary duties, obligations, and responsibilities of citizenship in the State in which he lives should be paid by all the 93,000,000 people of the United States. It is unjust, it is unfair, it is inequitable, it is indefensible for the people of this great Nation to ask the people of one State to bear an undue and an extraordinary proportion of a burden that in justice belongs to all the people of the Union.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

[Mr. HAYDEN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CLARK of Florida having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN].

[Mr. ALLEN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to another gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the consideration of this bill, I think it appropriate to discuss the question of farm credits and the important relation which that topic bears not alone to the interests of the farmers of this country, but to the food supply of the whole people.

Before the next Congress shall have expired there will be brought before it not only the matter of education for our agriculturists, but a consideration of the means of doing things which they know how to do.

The project of bettering the farmer's facilities for borrowing money in Europe has almost wholly been carried on by educating the farmer to help himself. The farmers have been taught to help themselves there by combinations of scattered, small units of the citizens, who organize small banks. A sort of investigation at the present time has been started in several different directions—a partial review of which was contained in the President's message upon that subject—for the purpose of ascertaining how they borrow money and what rate they pay in Europe. I anticipate that the next move may be an attempt to adapt European conditions to American conditions. I warn gentlemen of this House that it will be wholly impracticable. The plan must take other forms.

Attempting to work out this problem, I have introduced a bill which proposes to utilize the credit of the United States Government, without cost to it, and thereby materially lessen the interest burden now carried by the American farmer, and make it possible for him to borrow for legitimate needs at lower rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the gentleman would give the House the number of his bill. I should like to examine it.

Mr. BATHRICK. The number of my bill is H. R. 27661.

In most foreign countries farm-credit systems did not become an established factor in agriculture until the governments had assisted by advancing funds for the purpose of establishing farm-credit organizations. Various associations had been organized for many years, but nearly all of them had gone by the way and were lost sight of and had done very little good to the agriculture of France.

The profit from farm products received by the farmer can not stand 6 or 8 per cent interest on his debts. That is the reason why so large a proportion of the farms are mortgaged to-day and will remain mortgaged in the future unless something is done to change this condition.

Mr. Herbert Williams, in a statement before the Senate Finance Committee in 1910, made it plain that our farm population sold each year less than $300 per capita of farm products. A business of this character will not attract, but rather will repel investors, if money cost is too high. No business man will borrow money at a rate in excess of the net profit that he is getting in his business. If he does, he will stay in debt.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Does the gentleman remember that about 20 years ago this same matter was before the American people?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes; it has been before the American people periodically a good many times, but nothing has been done.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman that I am in entire sympathy, and hope to furnish him with a resolution which I introduced in the farmers' congress on the same line about 20 years ago, and I am going to vote for his bill when it comes up.

Mr. BATHRICK. I thank the gentleman; and many others will do the same, I think.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that a man in business would not borrow money at a rate in excess of the average net profit of his business.

Mr. BATHRICK. Not in excess of the profit on goods he expected to move by borrowing.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that a man that does not make any money never borrows money?

Mr. BATHRICK. Oh, yes; a man sometimes borrows money to get himself out of a hole that he got into by borrowing.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know of any way to force loans to the farmer?

Mr. BATHRICK. No. I know none of the loan sharks of the West will loan the farmer at a less rate of interest than 8 per cent, and you can not make them do it except by offering a lower rate elsewhere.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not speaking of the loan sharks of the West, but anybody.

Mr. BATHRICK. This is not a question of forcing anyone to lend; it is a question of relieving the farmers of this excessive burden which in the last analysis must be borne by the people who consume the food.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to say to the gentleman that I know farmers who are loaning money to business men at a rate of interest of 6 per cent.

Mr. BATHRICK. I am glad to hear this, but I am not talking about the farmers who have got out from under and are lending money. I am referring to the farmer who is obliged to borrow money, and prosperous farmers who know the road through debt on a farm will have sympathy for this movement. Besides, even the farmer who is now out of debt may desire to borrow money. No doubt many of them would do so and increase their acreage or otherwise better their facilities for producing crops if the interest rate were lower.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. I will.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like the gentleman to tell us the rate of interest paid by the farmers of Ohio on money that they borrow secured by mortgage.

Mr. BATHRICK. About 6 per cent; but there are schemers who seek to get more than the usual or fair rate everywhere. Even in this House some of we poorer Members are obliged to borrow money on the security of our salaries, and we pay nearly 8 per cent for it. I will say, however, that this seems to be no fault of the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Certainly.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, the question that I desire to ask would perhaps be more apropo had it been put at the time the gentleman was reciting the details. I would like to add to the gentleman's suggestion that the farmer sometimes is asked to pay graft to certain directors of the bank, is he not, in order to pay a bonus on the loan?

Mr. BATHRICK. I suppose there are such cases. I do not think that is the rule, however. I believe the bankers of this country are on the average very honest and public-spirited people, and they are doing their banking business in a legitimate way. But that is not the subject. The subject is to do something to give the farmer better financial connection and lower his interest rate.

Mr. LAMB. The Farmers' Cooperative Bank is the principle of the thing, is it not?

Mr. BATHRICK. Oh, I beg to partially differ with the gentleman. I do not in any sense oppose any cooperative system among the farmers for the purpose of securing credit for themselves. My bill refers particularly to the question of lending money upon mortgages and the farm-land mortgage interest burden of the country. It does not refer specifically to the small loans, although I can see in the future relief in that direction by such a measure. If the farmers of this country should choose to organize somewhat in the manner of those in Europe, I believe it will be a good thing for them, but the system of lending money by cooperative banking societies in Europe does not particularly include the question of taking care of the farm-mortgage indebtedness in the United States. The trouble with the European cooperative system—it is too slow. We will all be dead before we get any relief. I do not want to wait until people die before doing anything to relieve them.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Ohio believe that the loans that are so much needed by the farmer, as well as by other classes of people in business, would be facilitated if the national banking and currency law was so amended as to allow the national banks to make loans on real estate?

Mr. BATHRICK. I think they would, but I do not know how a national bank could safely lend money on real estate. The national bank takes deposits that are subject to demand at any time, and I do not see how such a bank can safely take over any great amount of land mortgages, because they are not sufficiently liquid to provide for withdrawals. Besides, this plan would not reduce the rate.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, could not the difficulty to which the gentleman refers be overcome by having the mortgage which is to secure the loan to the national bank issued in another form and underwritten by the bank, as a coupon bond, thereby constituting liquid security, which would be a liquid asset of the national bank?

Mr. BATHRICK. That is about the way it is done by the Crédit Foncier, of France. The Crédit Foncier issues a bond, or, more properly, a debenture. Those debentures have received a large sale, but I think mainly because they have a lottery feature connected with them that gives a premium to people who happen to draw the lucky debenture. You can not ingraft on the American system any lottery plan, and unless you do that I fear these debentures would be so far below par that people would not buy them.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to continue my statement without interruption.

I am pleased to note that the Agricultural bill carries so liberal an amount of the people's money for the purpose mainly of investigation and education looking to improvement in farm production. The farms of this country are really the storehouses of the people's food supply, and food is the last-ditch necessity. It has been the history of all nations that in times of peace and in the struggles of war the strongest support for prosperity and success is the prosperity of agriculture. I sometimes think that the people in the city are not fully alive to these facts. The population in this country has gone on increasing year after year until consumption is rapidly outrunning production of food. Statistics indicate the falling off of the exportation of these products, and, while it may be as far distant as two generations before production falls below consumption and we are obliged to import part of our food, I deem it good statesmanship that we take up this question pertaining to the improvement of agriculture and its relation to the necessities of the whole people and forestall any possibility of the direful results of a short food supply. We have been annually expending large sums to teach the farmer how to produce more and produce better, but we must now show him how to get the money to do it with.

Germany took up the question of helping the farmer to procure money with which to produce his crops at a time when famine stared that country in the face. We will not wait for any such exigency, but will confer upon our posterity, at least, and possibly upon ourselves living in this generation, the great good of supplying the last link to the chain of assistance to agriculture which we have so long been welding. In other words, knowing that farming is a business proposition and that business propositions can not be conducted without money, we will attempt to bring the farmer, now removed from financial facilities, into contact with means of a more ready procurement of loans. Minus these facilities the farmers of this country have been burdened with an enormous interest rate which has been a clog upon their efforts and an obstacle to the development of our agricultural resources.

The average rate of cost for farm loans in this country, as near as it can be ascertained, has been placed by careful investigators at about 8½ per cent. I use the word "cost" as distinguished from interest inasmuch as fees, bonuses, and other expenses have in the newer States to a great degree and in the older States to a smaller degree, but nevertheless surely, contributed to the cost of hiring money. It is estimated that the total interest burden upon farm debts is annually about $510,000,000. At the December price in 1911 the entire wheat crop of this country was valued at a little over $543,000,000, showing that it requires nearly the entire value of the wheat crop to pay our annual farm interest. The addition of this cost to the food consumed by all of us, whether we live in the city or country, is inevitable. Something can not be taken from nothing, and some one must pay. It can not therefore be considered class legislation if the Federal Government should do something to relieve this situation. We have expended large sums and taken long chances for the purpose of development in various directions. We have guaranteed railroad bonds, given away vast areas of land to encourage the building of transportation facilities, and done many other things which at first appearance seem for the benefit of private enterprise, but in effect reach out to enliven commerce, encourage competition, employ labor, and by this means benefit all the people.

It is a startling fact that farm interest, in the last generation, has consumed the total increase of all farm-land values. Every 12 years interest absorbs the value of all our farm buildings. Every 9 years it absorbs the value of all our live stock. Every 2½ years it absorbs the value of all our farm implements and machinery. Of all business enterprises the average profit upon agriculture is least compatible with a high rate of interest, and yet agriculture has been obliged to bear the heaviest rate of all.

The population of this country is but a few generations removed from foreign ancestry and many European customs and systems have therefore been naturally applied to our needs, and it is not surprising that in consideration of this subject we are liable to inquire into the method employed by European countries in coping with this question. Nonofficial and semi-official investigations have been made by societies, ambassadors, and individuals into the foreign plan. The information on this subject though quite extensive, is in many respects incomplete, but sufficient to suggest to us methods by which we may partly direct our efforts. We can not, however, expect to take European plans, formulated and operated upon the groundwork of a national and individual character very different from our own, and adapt them without change to our needs. How nearly we may go astray if we attempt this for this particular purpose is illustrated in our parcel-post law. There was no particular reason or warrant why we should limit the weight of our parcels to 11 pounds. The present Postmaster General has stated that he could as well operate it on a 60-pound basis. We simply took up the 11 pounds because Europe stipulated that weight.

This is the United States, and the Government belongs to all the people, and all the people certainly can do those things they want done for themselves. That, at least, is the theoretical assumption, and if we evolve some better plan than that employed by European countries there is no reason why we can not put it into force. There is no reason if the people know in which direction to start. In every movement of this kind there is always a confusion of ways and means, and the motive of those who lead is often concealed, but I will trust the farmers of this country to quickly detect any intention of special interests to profit by any farm credit plan that may be offered.

Without entering into a concise history of the European cooperative agricultural banks or their land-mortgage banks it is worth noting that France first instituted cooperative credit in 1857. Austria and Hungary adopted it in 1851; Italy and Belgium in 1864; Russia in 1861; and these were founded, to a great degree, upon the original movement in 1848, and known, respectively, as the Schulz-Delitzch and Raiffeisen systems of Germany. Thus it is quite apparent that the long tedious wait that elapsed before these systems reached their present, only partial, adoption, would scarcely be satisfactory to the more progressive spirit of the American people. Another illustration worth noting is that after an investigation of a committee which traveled throughout Europe, giving the matter their careful attention, Ireland adopted a cooperative plan in 1894. After about 15 years of operation the total amount loaned was only about $275,000, which is about equivalent to a tear dropped in the ocean of our necessities.

Although Great Britain has been flooded with a propaganda of education, and she has been contiguous to the countries where this credit scheme had been developed, the result is still a charge of 6 per cent interest, and there are less than 100 of the societies in operation with a total outstanding loan of less than $50,000.

In consideration of the new banking system which this House will take up shortly, it is worth while noting that one prominent writer states that nearly all the private banking companies of Europe use these cooperative credit societies as auxiliaries and handle a large portion of their funds. It should also be noted that the success so far attained in Europe seems to rest almost exclusively upon the willingness of all members of these credit societies to pledge their united liability for the loans to its members. In other words, if a man is a member of the credit society he must become surety for those who do borrow, even though he borrows nothing himself. It is evidently considered by all writers a fundamental necessity that the members of these cooperative credit societies pledge their combined resources for the debts of those who borrow.

I think it is palpable that the average American farmer has developed too much initiative and good business sense to make himself liable for other than his own debts. The European cooperative credit societies limit their membership to a small number, and these being each a surety for the other's obligation, institute a character of neighborhood espionage which would be entirely distasteful, and, I believe, impossible, to the average American farmer. Naturally, the farmer who was surety for his neighbor's debt watched his conduct.

It is not possible in my limited time to enter into all the details and reasons why the European method will not apply to America, but having pointed out a few facts why we need some kind of farm credit reform, I propose to briefly outline my own views as to a plan to bring it about.

As heretofore referred to, I have introduced a bill which, while not letter perfect and open to minor objections, perhaps, enunciates a principle which I believe to be entirely sound. This bill more nearly conforms, if the comparison is desired, with what is known in some other countries as the Landschaften or the Crédit Foncier. It is designed primarily to take care of a large portion of our $6,040,000,000 farm debt, and would reduce the interest rate to not more than 4½ per cent. It contemplates the establishment of a bureau which I am pleased to call the farm-loan bureau, to be under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The purpose of the bureau is to inquire into the value of farm land offered as security for the loans and the validity of title of the same. After the bureau shall have been satisfied upon these two items the Treasurer of the United States shall issue the amount of the loan to the applicant upon a receipt of the mortgage properly executed to him on behalf of the United States Government, but loans are not to be in excess of 60 per cent of the value of the property. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue bonds of the United States bearing not in excess of 4½ per cent interest. The sum due upon the farm loans and payable upon the bonds shall bear as close a relation to each other as possible, that there may not be at any time a considerable balance upon one side or the other. Applicants and appraisers will be made subject to severe fine and imprisonment for fraud. Control of other detail of operation is to be left largely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. This discretion is quite necessary, as it would be impossible to draw a bill that would anticipate all of the details.

Given the final day when the Government of the United States under this proposed measure had taken over all the farm-land mortgages of the United States, and what would be the result? It is noted that the interest received from the farmers is not to exceed 4½ per cent and that the bonds sold are not to bear interest in excess of 4 per cent. I am quite confident that both of these maximum rates can be materially reduced and be entirely workable, but in any event there should be a margin of one-half of 1 per cent to the Government on these loans. The result would be a surplus, accumulated from the difference in the rate of interest which we pay on bonds and receive on mortgages, approximately of $10,000,000 to $25,000,000 per year in the hands of the farm-loan department. This would be utilized to cover possible losses, to pay operating expenses, or to reduce the taxes of the whole people. I can see no reason why an amortization plan could not be adopted and put in workable form as one of the details in the operation of this bill. The Government can borrow money on long time at a low rate of interest, and amortization tables could be worked out wherein the mortgagor, paying a small percentage of the debt above the interest rate, would be constantly reducing the principal, until at the end of his term he would be out of debt.

Regulations could be instituted covering cases whereby farm boys and farm tenants could be assisted in purchasing farms of their own. Farmers who now hesitate to borrow at the present rate of interest would see profit in enlarging their acreage and increasing their facilities for producing larger crops. A $5,000 mortgage on a $10,000 or $12,000 farm, at the present average rate of interest, will in many cases consume nearly the entire profit. There is consequently little reason for the farmer boy to remain at home for the discouraging purpose of merely keeping even with the debt. Many commercial businesses are sufficiently profitable to carry the present rate of interest, but the average farm business can not carry it, with the result that the cry of "back to the farm" chokes in our throats at sight of this heart-eating interest rate.

Debt on the farm is a cloud blacker than night hovering over the farmer's rounded shoulders, and the "merry farmer's boy" stops whistling at sight of it and dreams of the city. Profit will keep the boy on the farm competing there instead of with overcrowded labor in town. A 1½ to 4 per cent difference on the annual farm interest debt will often make the difference between a satisfied farm boy and one going out the front gate with a valise, bound for town to stay.

A very large proportion of all our commerce in this country is conducted upon credit, but the cost of credit is normally regulated by the profit of commerce. Those few avocations of commerce which are not sufficiently profitable to use credit at a cost set by those which lead can only struggle on without this advantage. Agriculture has long been in this class, and, minus the greater margins of profit, it has thereby been oftener put to the necessity of borrowing, and the necessity of borrowing has made it a prey to all kinds of pound-of-flesh lenders. It may be possible that we can dispense with the weaker brethren of these lines of commerce which provide us with some necessities of life, but we can not dispense with the farm. The preservation of our food supply, looking ahead with only reasonable precaution, is all-sufficient excuse for legislation that can not help but be beneficial to the man in the city as well as the man on the farm.

This bill does not contemplate the entrance of the Government in the field of banking. It only contemplates on the part of the Government the guaranty of a farm mortgage. We have guaranteed railroad bonds and we are now lending money to the banks at 2½ per cent. Who can contend that guaranteeing a farm mortgage is less safe than guaranteeing a railroad bond? Who can contend that it is class legislation to lend money to the farmer upon security of the earth itself at 4½ per cent when we are now lending money at 2½ per cent on security of municipal or county bonds?

The bonds issued by the Government under this proposition would have behind them not only the taxing power of the people but they would have behind them also the individual property and value of the land upon which the bonds are, in effect, predicated. It would not be inflation, because it would be merely a transfer of a debt due one class of lenders to a debt due another class. France is the most prosperous nation on the earth to-day, and yet she has four times the national debt, in outstanding bonds, of the United States, notwithstanding that our resources are much greater than hers.

The function of lending money to farmers on land mortgages might be given under Government control to a private company, but why do that if the Government must control the private company? The control would be as surely the exercise of Government function in the matter as it would be for the Government to do the work itself, with the disadvantage of turning whatever profit there was in the business over to the individuals of the private company instead of back into the pockets of the people through the National Treasury. No bureau could be established for the purpose of handling money that could be less open to possibilities of the malfeasance of public officials than this. Its operation could not be attended by any of the acts of official dishonesty which are brought out as arguments against Government ownership of public utilities and little technical knowledge would be required by the commissioners.

There are those who fear every move that appears in any way or sense an innovation. They cling tenaciously to ancient history and shudder at the making of new history. We are not bound to do all things as Europe does. We are a progressive Nation, and it is our purpose to do things better than Europe does. We have grown to a mighty Nation because of innovation and because of the development of new institutions, and if we can by Federal legislation cure the ills with which this subject deals in six months or a year, why wait for the dilatory results of the half century that has been required to partly cure them in the European way? [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa to use the balance of his time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to indorse what my colleague [Mr. BATHRICK] has said in reference to the importance of legislation looking to the establishment of farm credit cooperative concerns, however much difference of opinion there may be as to the form of the legislation. There are few subjects that can engage the attention of the House that are of more importance to the country at large than that one, and he is to be commended for his zeal in going into that subject. However, Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself more especially to the bill under consideration. This bill carries some $17,000,000, and I will say that there is no appropriation made by the House of Representatives which brings larger returns to the American people [applause] than the returns made by the appropriation passed for the Department of Agriculture. In that bill there is no item that will bring larger return than the item that relates to the farm-management work, of which I wish especially to speak. In the report of the committee on the last year's bill an appropriation of $186,000 was provided for that bureau. It will be remembered that there was something of a contest in the House, and as a result of that contest the appropriation was increased to $250,000. When that bill went to the Senate that appropriation was increased still more to the sum of $300,000, and in that form the bill of last year finally passed. In the committee report of this year $375,000 are allowed. That, however, is not the amount that is asked for by the department. As I understand, the head of the bureau, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, has asked for $435,000; and to me it is a matter of regret that the committee did not feel justified in allowing even this enlarged appropriation, because I am sure that it is an appropriation that means much, not simply to the farmers of the country but to all the people of the country. As we come to ask an enlarged appropriation for the farm-management work, it is but proper that there be a sort of invoice to see what has been done and see what has been accomplished with the money we appropriated last year.

I invite attention to the fact, in the first place, that as a result of the increased appropriation made last year the work of the Farm Management Bureau has already been organized in 60 counties of the United States. That is to say, an expert from the Agricultural Department has been assigned to those counties, and the work is already organized and going on successfully. I have before me here a statement which I shall insert in the RECORD, showing the present status of the work.

Total number of counties in the foregoing list, 65.
Up to date there have been 186 inquiries from counties all over the country relative to this cooperative work, in addition to the lists shown above.

Mr. WILLIS. For example, in the State of Minnesota an expert, an "agricultural soil doctor," if I may so characterize him, has been assigned to seven counties in that State. In New York six men have been assigned to six counties and are at work in those counties. In Iowa they have been assigned to four counties, in Michigan to six, in Pennsylvania to six, Wisconsin four, Ohio one, and so on in the different States of the Union, making a total of 60 counties in which the work is now organized and being carried on successfully.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I will ask the gentleman if he is not mistaken in that it is 78 instead of 60 counties?

Mr. WILLIS. I got the figures from the Department of Agriculture a few days ago.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I got my information from the Secretary of Agriculture, and he gave me 78.

Mr. WILLIS. I said the Department of Agriculture gave me the figures only a few days ago, but very likely the gentleman is correct, and he suggests now that the organization has been perfected in 78 counties; if so, it simply enforces the point I am seeking to make, that under this appropriation the work is going on and is going on rapidly and successfully. At the time I had this statement prepared there were 23 counties in the United States in which the funds had already been allotted, and they were ready to commence, simply awaiting the assignment of men from the Agricultural Department. In the State of Illinois there were 3, Michigan there were 4, Iowa there were 3, New York 4, and so on through the various States, making a total of 23. Now, in addition to that, when this report was made out there were 65 additional counties, besides those I have already named, in which the people were organizing and raising their funds and in which they expected to be able to apply at a very early date for the assignment of men.

In the State of New York there were 12 counties; in Iowa, 10; in Ohio, 5; Pennsylvania, 12; Michigan, 11; and so on in the various States, making 65 in all. So that, counting those in which the work is already organized and those in which the funds have been allotted and those in which the funds are now in process of collection, there are 148 counties in the United States in which this work is well under way, and in addition to that there were some 186 others that were making their plans, making the total at the time this table was prepared of 334 counties in which the work had been organized or was in process of organization since the appropriation bill of last year passed.

I notice in the hearings, pages 28 and 30, that a very detailed account of the work is given by the head of the bureau, and at this time I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a certain part from the hearings and from the bulletin of the Ohio Experiment Station.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. At page 30 of the hearings, where the committee is making inquiry concerning the duties of county agents, the following statements occur:

Mr. LEVER. Just what does this man do?

Mr. SPILLMAN. Well, his work is so large and so diverse that I can not answer that in just a sentence. There are four general types of work for him to do. The first thing we instruct him to do is this: We realize that there are already farmers in that county who know more about farming on their farms than anybody else knows. We instruct him to hunt up all of those highly successful farmers and learn all they know. After a man has made a study of hundreds of farms in one county, if he is the right kind of man, he will know more about farming in that county than any one man, because he has gotten to know so many of them. We say, "We know there are lots of men in this county who know a great deal more than we know about certain phases of farming here, and we want to get that and make it public property—give it to the other farmer who does not know—and we are going about now to learn." Well, the farmers take that as a compliment to them, as it is intended and as it is deserved. Then, after a man has made a study of hundreds of the best farms in the county, he becomes a welcome visitor on any farm in that county, and we find the more advanced and progressive a farmer is the more eager he is to have these men visit his farm.

Mr. LEVER. Now, then, does he establish a series of farms in the shape of a circuit, which he visits from time to time?

Mr. SPILLMAN. In some cases he does that. We have, for instance, one man in Bedford County, Pa., who has been there for some time; you see, we have only started most of these men in this year, but that man we have had at work three years, and he has this year 1,700 farms growing some crop under his direction.

Mr. LEVER. How does he manage to visit those crops and see that they are growing according to his directions?

Mr. SPILLMAN. He has what the farmers of the county call a manure spreader, a little automobile; he gets over that county and he can visit about 20 men a day with that automobile, and sometimes, if they are close together, he can visit more than that, and frequently he will get 40 or 50 of them together at a schoolhouse and talk with all of them, and in one hour he will get the situation before these farmers.

Mr. CANDLER. You say he has 1,700 demonstrations in one county?

Mr. SPILLMAN. Yes. The farmers call his automobile the manure spreader, and when we asked them why they called it that they said, because it had increased the yield of crops all over that county. Now, to show you the effect of this work, I will take that county where we have been at work the longest time. It is a county up in the mountains, where apple trees do very well. The farmers have had apple orchards there ever since they have been there, but they had never taken any special care of those orchards. They had never done any spraying; they knew nothing about pruning; and they knew nothing about packing, sorting, or marketing the apples; they would simply take everything off the trees they could get—good, bad, and indifferent—and put the apples in barrels and sell to the local buyers. Three years ago he interested a few men in pruning and spraying their orchards; that fall he got them to form a little organization, and built a packing shed alongside the railroad; he helped them grade their apples; and that fall those men shipped out three carloads of especially fine apples. They got a net price of 85 cents a bushel for them, while those who sold locally got from 25 cents to 50 cents. Now, the next year more farmers came into this organization, and they shipped 42 carloads of apples last year from that one county. The year before was the first time a carload had ever been shipped by the farmers, but for this year I have not had a report. I do not know how many carloads were shipped this year, but I am sure more than last year.

The farm-management work proper was first provided for in the appropriation bill of 1904. At the same time the Knapp work in the South was commenced. As a matter of fact, but little was done in the Northern States for many years outside of investigation. Dr. Spillman, of the Department of Agriculture, now at the head of the Farm Management Bureau, had charge of all the investigation. Dr. Knapp had charge of the cooperative demonstration work in the South. Large appropriations were made to exterminate the boll weevil, but it was found out that there was no way to head off the ravages of this insect, and, as a matter of fact, the appropriations which were made presumably to exterminate the boll weevil have been used very largely in teaching the poorer class of farmers in the South the elements of agriculture. They have been taught the benefits of diversification of industry, crop rotation, soil fertility, and so forth. I commend to the Members of the House the statement made by Dr. Knapp on page 41 of the hearings. The statement of Dr. Knapp is as follows:

Now, what we do with this money is to put county demonstration agents at work, who take up with the farmers the problem of how to produce cotton under boll-weevil conditions, and at the same time show them how they can grow their own meat, grow their own forage, and grow their own corn, and, as they say in the South, live at home. Where we strike a territory in the South, as you gentlemen from the South know, in which cotton has been raised for years and years under old conditions, it has been the custom of every renter, every tenant, and practically every farmer, even where he owned his own farm, to go to his merchant or to his banker and get his advance for the next year. The entire cotton crop was raised on credit. When the boll weevil came along the bankers lost faith in the ability of the people to produce cotton; they got frightened and withdrew credit from the farmers; the merchants withdrew credit, and they could not get credit from their bankers, or from the commission men in New Orleans, Atlanta, or other central places. And when credit goes down, as happened in Mississippi, labor, when it can not get an advance, simply gives up and leaves the country, and it comes back very slowly; in fact, a good deal of that labor will never come back to the territory it left, the result being abandoned houses, abandoned farms, fields lying idle, distress, and everything of that sort. Now, under those circumstances we must teach those people to grow their own stuff so they will not have to have that amount of credit, and that we can do if we have men teaching them how to raise corn, forage, peanuts, and other things. By doing that work we save farms from being abandoned, because we put them on their feet and teach them how to farm successfully. And those who follow the directions of the Government in raising cotton continue to raise cotton year in and year out successfully, even with the boll weevil there.

For example, it is quite clear that as a result of the work of this single bureau, the corn crop of the sunny South has been increased almost 200,000,000 bushels in a single year. So it has come about that the Southland has come to be one of the great corn-producing sections of the country, in regions where, before this work was commenced, practically no corn was raised.

When this work commenced the farmers of the South were dependent almost entirely upon their single crop of cotton. They bought their meat, and their flour, and substantially everything they used. When the cotton crop failed they were completely broken financially. The object of the Knapp work has been to teach them the great advantage of the diversification of industry, and, as is well known, the work has been marvelously successful. All this time but comparatively little has been done in the North, as I undertook to show in my remarks when the agricultural appropriation bill of 1912 and the Lever extension bill were pending in the House. But in recent years a great impetus has been given to the farm-management work. The object of this work is to study the farm as a whole. It is not merely a scientific investigation of this crop or that crop, but the idea of the work is that a man shall go from the department directly to the farmer, study the farm as a unit, find out whether the farm is paying, and, if not, why not. The experts sent out by the department help the farmer in solving his practical problems. There is no bureau in the Government that is doing more for the betterment of the people than the Farm Management Bureau.

They are helping in the solution of the problem of the high cost of living. In my judgment the solution they are proposing, viz, greater and more economical production, is the only one possible. Their appropriation two years ago was $150,000. As the result of the contest in the House and the liberality of the Senate the appropriation last year was increased to $300,000. The work that is being accomplished with this money is wonderful. Sixty counties in the United States already have county men—that is to say, a man is assigned to the county. He is given $1,200 by the department. The rest of his expenses, office rent, and so forth, are provided for by the county. In most cases the county furnishes this officer with a little runabout, so that he can reach all parts of the county readily. The idea is eventually to have a "soil doctor," or agricultural doctor, so called, in every county. This officer is sort of a councilor, who may be consulted by any farmer at will. Sixty counties already have the work fully organized and the men at their posts; 23 more counties have their arrangements all made and are awaiting the detail of the men; 250 more counties have made application for detail of men; so that it can be seen that the idea is spreading over the country like wildfire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. Thank you.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to an analysis of the work that is being undertaken in my own State of Ohio, and for this analysis I am very largely indebted to Experiment Station Bulletin No. 127, prepared by Mr. L. H. Goddard, of the Ohio Experiment Station. In a word, the plan of the work, as we are undertaking to carry it on in our State, is this: At the head of the organization is a State leader, who is responsible not only to the department, but also to the State. The State is cooperating in this work and is paying liberally for carrying it on. A statement appears in the hearings showing the amount contributed by each State, and I believe that the State of Ohio is contributing more, perhaps, than any State in the Union to this particular branch of the work. As is shown by the hearings (p. 35), the State of Ohio is contributing $11,760 per annum to this important work. According to the table given in the hearings no other State in the Union is contributing so liberally.

Under the State law there are seven district supervisors, and then beneath those it is required that there shall be a county agent, a "soil doctor" or "agricultural doctor," for each county, assigned to that county and within the reach of the farmer. We have been collecting a vast amount of scientific information in the Agricultural Department, but the trouble has been to get that information to the actual farmer, so that he may solve his actual practical problems.

Now, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the work of the Farm Management Bureau comes nearer to bringing this scientific information right to the doors of the farmer, so that he can apply it practically to his own problems, than does any other agency of the Government. The prime purpose of the farm management, field studies, and demonstration work in Ohio is to bring to each farmer on his own farm, and interpret for his farm, the results of the years of experimental investigation that have been made by the experiment stations of the Department of Agriculture of this and other countries, and to combine these results of scientific investigations with the successful farm practices worked out by the best farmers of the country. In short, it is a plan to help combine the science of the farmer with practice on his own farm.

But it may be said, Why this concern and solicitude for the farmer? It may be said that because of the high cost of living, about which we hear so much, the farmer is already making immense profits.

But I want to invite attention to this fact, that although prices are good for the farmer's products—and they are a whole lot better than they will be when, under threatened tariff reduction, substantially everything that the farmer produces is put on the free list—yet even now, with the high rate of prices, the farmer is not making the profit that many people suppose he is making. A great portion of the high consumer's cost goes to pay the high cost of transportation and the high cost of distribution, so that in many instances the farmer gets only 20 or 30 or 40 per cent of the price actually paid for the article by the consumer.

I have before me a very interesting table that was prepared by the agricultural experiment station of the State of Ohio. An investigation was made to find out what the farmer was actually making as compared with the wages of hired men. It was found in the area investigated that the average wage of the hired man on the farm was $360 a year. The experts said, "We wonder whether the men who are hiring these people are actually making more than the hired men are making. Is it more profitable to be a farmer or his hired man?"

Here is the result of the investigation: There were 5.4 per cent of the farmers that were making more than $500 more than the hired man was making per year. There were 3.8 per cent who were making between $400 and $500 more than the hired man was making. There were also 3.8 per cent that were making between $300 and $400 more than the hired man was making. There were 4 per cent receiving from $200 to $300 more than the hired man was receiving. There were 8 per cent receiving from $100 to $200 in excess of what the hired man was making. There were 9 per cent who were receiving from $1 to $100 more than the hired man was making; and, note this, Mr. Chairman, there were 66 per cent of the farmers in that great section of my native State of Ohio that actually were making less than the hired man was making. So that the farmer is not making these immense profits which he is supposed to be making. Let us give him this increased appropriation. He deserves it and the welfare of the country demands it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to add certain statements from Bulletin 127 of the Ohio Experiment Station, by L. H. Goddard. The statements are as follows:

The following is the outline of a plan which has been adopted by the Ohio Experiment Station, department of cooperation, and the United States Department of Agriculture, Office of Farm Management of the Bureau of Plant Industry, for reorganizing the extension work which has previously been conducted by the former institution. In the execution of this plan there will be required:

1. A State leader to be employed jointly by the two institutions who, as the representative of both, will have charge of all their work of this character in the State.

2. Seven district supervisors to be employed in the same manner as the State leader, to be responsible directly to the State leader, each to have charge of the farm management field studies and demonstration work which may be conducted in an assigned district of from 10 to 15 counties.

3. County agents to be installed by the State leader at the request of the counties interested, to be under the direction of the supervisor of the district in which that county is situated, and to be supported jointly by the Ohio Experiment Station, the United States Department of Agriculture, and the people of that county, and possibly by other organizations interested in the work. These county agents are to have charge of the field studies and demonstration work which may be conducted in the county to which they have been assigned.

Township assistance will be afforded temporarily by each district supervisor in a single township of his district in which special interest is shown in demonstration work.

* * * * * * *

District supervisors and county agents should be men who have had training in our best agricultural colleges, who are therefore familiar with the advanced theories of agricultural production and who have also had practical experience on the farm as boys and for several years after leaving college.

When these county agents are placed in a community, it will be their duty first of all to study the local farming conditions. They must get acquainted with the farmers and learn what is being done in the way of crops grown, cultural practices, means taken to keep up the production of the farm, the usual enterprises of the farm, how these are organized into a farm system; in short, what the actual farm problems of the community are, and then to cooperate with each farmer in helping him to place his cultural operations and farming system on a better paying basis. Such a man will not be able to reach conclusions nor revolutionize agriculture in a day, but if he is aggressive and farmers will make use of him in the same way they do a doctor or a lawyer he will prove of great helpfulness in any agricultural community.

But having this information, just how shall we take it to the farmer on his own farm? It would be highly desirable if a district supervisor could do this himself, but he can not investigate and demonstrate at the same time. We must keep a staff of investigators constantly at work if we wish our demonstrations to be of value. To be entirely frank, our experience in Ohio teaches us that the greatest danger which to-day confronts agricultural extension work in a progressive section is the inability of the extension workers to state to the individual farmer much of anything with definite assurance. While the scientist has developed a vast amount of valuable information, this must be adapted to individual farm conditions if it is to be of value to the farmer. If it is not so adapted, the demonstrator is just as apt to be discredited as is the doctor who prescribes medicine without having first diagnosed the condition of his patient.

While we believe firmly in the value of cooperative experiments, we also believe that these experiments will be very much more effective if their use is directed by a county agent who can give his attention constantly to a single county. Each experiment ought to be planned specially for the conditions existing on the farm on which it is to be made, and, if possible, its execution should be carefully supervised. Many farmers will doubtless be able to determine from the published reports of the district supervisors what is best for their farms, especially if the conditions are not too intricate, just as many of us go with freedom and assurance to our medicine shelf for relief from the minor ailments. But just as most of us reach the time, sooner or later, when we are willing to call in the doctor, most farmers will at times be glad to call in the county agent, who, in the light of his previous training, instruction by his district supervisor, and experience with similar cases, can speak with some assurance as to what should be done under existing conditions.

On the other hand, too much must not be expected of the county agent. It is necessary that we crawl before we walk and walk before we run. If we are to secure permanent results, it will be necessary to build slowly and securely and to avoid spectacular work. At first thought it might be supposed that a trained man could determine off hand just what it would be wise for the farmers of any section to do. On the contrary, however, we have observed that almost every farm has some conditions which are peculiar unto itself, and not the least of these peculiarities are the likes and dislikes of the manager, which manifestly are of paramount importance. Therefore the first step of the county agent is to make a study of the local conditions, just as a doctor should diagnose carefully his patient's trouble before prescribing medicine.

Thus far the only kind of extension work to which special reference has been made is that associated with farm practice, which considers only the selection and arrangement of the operations in connection with individual farm crops or farm enterprises to enable the production of maximum yields. While large yields are certainly very important, maximum yields and the most successful farming do not necessarily go hand in hand. The only basis on which the success of a farm can really be judged is that of net income from the whole farm, providing the productive capacity of the farm has not been impaired.

Farm management considers, among other things, what enterprises—crops, kind of livestock, etc.—shall be undertaken on any given farm, how they shall be arranged, and how in detail they shall be conducted in order to fit into this arrangement. The selection of each enterprise depends upon many things, such as adaptability of soil, climate, available labor, and possible market. It is useless to undertake to introduce enterprises on a farm which will not produce well under the conditions existing thereon, or for which there will not be sufficient available labor, or from which the products can not readily be marketed at satisfactory prices.

In the absence of a local condition which makes available transient labor of satisfactory quality at reasonable prices, it is necessary to try to select enterprises that will use the same amount of labor all the year round. In doing this it may be necessary to select two crops which conflict to a certain extent in their labor requirements, thus forcing the yield of one or both to be lowered materially for want of attention at the proper time. It may even be wise to grow a crop which produces little if any profit, merely to keep the labor employed continuously. * * *

* * * * * * *

While these supervisors and agents can not be everywhere and do everything—indeed, if their work is to be fruitful they must give most of their attention to a few things at a time—yet with the proper spirit, which we shall hope to develop in each and every one of them, they can wield a wonderful influence toward making rural Ohio one of the best places in the world in which to live, and toward maintaining, or even improving, our present high standard of citizenship. Unless the signs of the times are misleading there are stranger things possible than that the rural teachers and the rural preachers, together with the leaders of many other rural organizations, will become very able lieutenants in connection with this great extension movement. Let us hope that the signs indicate truly, for 1 man to 3,000 farms, which would be the best that could be hoped for when an agent has been installed in every county of the State, would be but a drop in the bucket. He would have to visit 10 farms every day in order to get around once a year.

In conclusion, then, farm management field studies and demonstration work, as they are now being launched in Ohio, contemplate not only the improvement of the crop yields of the State but also the production of a greater net income for each farm of the State and the establishment on these farms of better homes, situated in better rural communities.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD—the remarks that I made this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

[Mr. HAWLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] has kindly yielded three minutes of his time to me, and I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we live in the midst of revolution—revolution proposed and revolution threatened. It is true there are few open avowals of revolutionary intent; no armed forces hostile to our form of government and to our institutions thunder at our gates or threaten our liberties. On the contrary, the forces of revolution, though they have among their leaders many supremely selfish and inordinately ambitious and some thoroughly irresponsible and consciousless men, are in the main composed of entirely well-meaning people, who, carried away by their enthusiasm or by the claims and sophistries of others, fail utterly to realize that they are the advocates and supporters of a revolutionary cause.

Our forefathers came to these shores to escape persecution—social, religious, political. They came to get away from too much government. They fled from pestiferous interference with their local and personal affairs, by authorities with whom they had little influence and over whom they had no control, quite as much as from flagrant acts of tyranny and persecution. In fact, all history teaches us that the petty annoyances, indignities, and injustices inflicted by the irresponsible agents of a centralized government have in all times been more intolerable than the atrocious but generally infrequent persecution and tyranny of despots. Beaurocracy, the agent of centralization, has made more anarchists than all the overt acts of tyranny.

Our forefathers sought to establish a government under which the affairs and conditions of daily life, of men's association with each other, should be directly controlled locally by the people themselves. No doubt they realized that such a government must, in the nature of things, be at times less forceful and effective in certain respects than a government directed and exercised from a distance, and thus free from the faults which purely local interests sometimes develop in a locally governed community. No doubt they realized that there would be times when, under the stress of local excitement, the pressure of local interest, the temporary lapse of local virtue, the machinery of government, and of law enforcement would be temporarily enfeebled, palsied, or paralyzed; and yet realizing all these things, profiting by their own experience, by their intimate knowledge of the history of mankind, they deliberately chose a form of government in which most of the authority of the people was exercised locally.

Critically analyzed, some of the complaints of our forefathers of over-sea interference with local rights seem trivial, and in a sense they were, but they were of tremendous importance in the principles they involved. So important were they held to be that they led to a declaration of independent sovereignty and to a separation through revolution. On the foundation of the Colonies and the Colonial Governments was established our Government, in which the people reserved unto themselves, to be exercised within the States and their subdivisions, the major elements of their sovereignty.

This is the Government we are sworn to uphold. The portion of the sovereignty of the people which they have surrendered, or, rather, agreed to exercise jointly under a National Government, is set out in the Constitution in language reasonably clear and explicit; and that is the instrument we are sworn to uphold and defend against all enemies, foreign and domestic, which includes well-meaning enemies as well as willfully wicked ones.

We realize that such a government has its faults, its weaknesses, along certain lines and in certain directions. It is scarcely to be hoped that such a government will be as constantly forcefully effective and as uniform in the enforcement of all the laws as it is conceivable a centralized power might be. We must admit that at infrequent times and in various localities the local arm of the law under our system is weak and ineffective and temporarily fails to adequately protect life or property, and we realize that one can imagine a centralized government comparatively free from such temporary local inefficiency. But, nevertheless and notwithstanding, we still adhere to the view that as eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, so local responsibility and local exercise of authority is the price of that interest in and aptitude for government, among the masses of the people, which arms and supports them in the exercise of that vigilance which perpetuates liberty.

What I have just said is not intended as the opening of a Fourth of July oration or of a dissertation on American Government. It is preliminary to some observations which I shall make with respect to what, I regret to say, seems to be a very live issue. On May 9 last Mr. LEE of Georgia reported from the Committee on Agriculture a bill entitled "A bill for the protection of migratory and insectivorous game birds of the United States." A short time before that, namely, on April 26, 1912, Senator MCLEAN reported from the Senate Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game a bill entitled "A bill to protect migratory game and insectivorous birds in the United States." On January 22, 1913, the said bill passed the Senate without any real debate and practically by unanimous consent. This bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, was ordered reported, and is, I believe, now on the calendar.

If to-morrow morning all the people of the United States were to realize that their sovereignty and control over a very important matter had been wiped out or attempted to be abrogated, that all of the statutes on all of the statute books of all the States on an important subject had been repealed or attempted to be made nugatory by an act of Congress; if they knew that Congress was proposing an army of Federal officials, armed with power to make arrests anywhere within the States for trifling offenses the nature and character of which neither they nor their immediate or their more distant representatives had any hand in defining or had any control in modifying; if they could realize, for instance, that under this proposed legislation a barefoot boy in any State in the Union might be arrested, taken before a Federal judge hundreds of miles from his home, sentenced to pay a heavy fine and to imprisonment for shooting a blackbird he found digging up his garden patch; if they were aware that a farmer, who in attempting to protect his field of young corn from the invasion of a colony of crows had shot one of them, might be put to all the expense and subjected to all the annoyance and disgrace incident to a trial in a Federal court, fined, and imprisoned for an act which was not in violation of any local statute or contrary to any local or State-wide opinion as to the thing done being in any wise improper; if people could fully understand these things, and could further realize what such an extension or attempted extension of Federal police power means and what it inevitably leads to, instead of there being a general acquiescence in this legislation and few protests against it, there would be such a cloud of protest as we have not heard in a generation.

It is 18 years since the beginning of my service here. In all that time there has been no legislation reported that has approached this in its revolutionary character.

It is urged on the ground of necessity. It is claimed that some clerk in the Department of Agriculture a number of years ago, without responsibility, probably with little information, but with much imagination, said that insects were destroying $800,000,000 worth of agricultural products per annum. How much of pure imagination there was in that no one knows; certainly not the man who wrote it. How much of such destruction is avoidable if the country were covered with insect-destroying birds nobody knows. The probability is that the guess was a tremendously exaggerated one, born of that desire which burns in the heart of every bureau chief to increase his appropriations and enhance his power and authority. [Applause.]

The question as to whether this damage, large or small, could be to any extent minimized if all the wild feathered creatures in the world were protected from destruction by human agencies forevermore nobody knows. The probability is that such protection would have comparatively little effect.

But admitting for the sake of argument that there is little exaggeration in the eight hundred millions, that it is largely avoidable, shall we change the character of the Government that our fathers gave us because of the hope in the breasts of some gentlemen that we may be able to partly stop this destruction? Oh, but gentlemen say "there is no considerable extension of Federal authority." On the contrary, it is the first irrevocable step toward the ultimate, complete extension of Federal police authority and the extinction of local authority. Enact this legislation and there is no justification for a stand against the most extreme assertion of Federal police power in the States of the Union.

As a people, it is said to our discredit that of all civilized peoples we least effectively protect human life, the most sacred of all things. I presume that is exaggerated, but it is a generally accepted statement. At any rate homicides are, God knows, too common. Lynchings, burnings, assaults are common, and no one section can point the finger of scorn at another and charge it as being more guilty than all others in these things.

The newspapers recently gave us, in all their horrid and gruesome details, the story of the burning of a human being charged with the crime of murder. We were informed that the mob of men and boys who chained this poor unfortunate to an iron pump in the front yard of a building dedicated to the administration of law and the dispensation of justice, covered him with tar and applied the torch, was the same mob which a few hours before had similarly tortured and murdered an innocent man for the same crime. So frequently as to bring down upon us the merited reproach of civilized men everywhere are these outbreaks of organized violence, holdups, assaults, murders, and lynchings, and yet do we hear any suggestion of invoking the strong and effective arm of the National Government to protect human life and punish those who wantonly, vengefully, and cruelly take it?

And why not? Because under our form of government the duty and the power to protect and punish rests with the people locally. If it were proposed that the Central Government be called upon to protect human life and punish its taking, what a chorus of protests there would be against it on the ground of its unconstitutionality. But because the people in some of the States have failed somewhat in properly protecting bird life, because some gentlemen want the hunting improved for their benefit, because in some States gentlemen desire to place on the Federal Government the burden and expense of protecting game birds they propose, and many good people approve, an extension of Federal authority which would not be sanctioned for the protection of human life.

A year or two ago local conditions in a great State of the Union noted for its general enforcement of the law, so broke down local government as to lead to the unchecked and unpunished destruction of millions of dollars' worth of property, the burning of barns and tobacco warehouses. Has anyone proposed in this admitted temporary failure of local government, in its protection of property, the strong arm of the Federal Government should be invoked? No; and why? Because we realize that while the arm of the centralized power might furnish better protection in such cases than the temporarily weak and inefficient local arm——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why should it?

Mr. MONDELL. It would possibly be free from local influences; that is the verdict of history; but—and there is the rub—in the long run tyranny would be established and the liberties of the people taken from them in the hope of establishing more stable and effective enforcement of law.

But I suppose we are expected to adopt the view that the birds, to those who love them—and no one loves them more than I—are more valuable than human life, and that we may change our Government and its institutions fundamentally for their protection when no one would suggest it for the protection of property or human life.

Much is said in official reports as to the destruction of insect-destroying birds and the consequent increase of insect life, but when we come to the hearings and the arguments made before the committee we find that certain gentlemen are disturbed because the ducks and geese are not as plentiful as they used to be and shooting is not quite so good on private preserves as they would like to have. No one is so foolish as to imagine that the multiplication of water fowl would in any appreciable degree lead to the destruction of insects, for these creatures do not to any considerable extent live upon crop-destroying insects.

As a boy I lived in northern Iowa. The air in the spring and fall was filled with the flying millions of geese and brant and swan and ducks of every hue and name and kind. The uplands and lowlands were vibrant and vocal with bird life, and for five years all of our crops were destroyed by grasshoppers. [Laughter.] One report has it that the grasshopper invasion was due to the destruction of birds. Why, bless your soul, in that great dry Northwest, where those creatures under favorable conditions breed mightily, there was practically no population save a few arrow-bearing savages, and in the territory which they devastated bird life was gloriously plentiful.

In the native habitat of the grasshopper the seasons were for several years dry and free from frost in the period of hatching. They were favorable for years to the increasing hordes of locusts; but, under other conditions in the regions they migrated to and devastated, nature finally weakened them and parasites attacked them. The same nature which in its favorable mood and aspect favored their increase, through rain and frost and parasites wiped them from the face of the earth and they were seen no more; they were destroyed save in diminished numbers in their native habitat, where they now sometimes so increase as to be locally destructive.

I shall not at length discuss the constitutionality of this legislation. I will leave that for the lawyers. I could not do it without expressing an opinion of the views of gentlemen who favor it from a constitutional standpoint, which I think no Member should express in regard to a colleague. [Laughter.] Some of them claim that a bird is interstate commerce. I have never heard of the consignee or the consignor of the blackbird or the crow or the brant that wings its flight across the blue vault of heaven.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is speaking about live birds.

Mr. MONDELL. Dead birds are property, and if they get into interstate trade they are interstate commerce and under control of the Federal Government.

Some say that as migratory birds are sometimes in one State and sometimes in another they are the property of the United States, and therefore subject to its protection. I confess I am utterly unable to grasp this refinement of alleged logic; but if we admit that game, by crossing a State line, can become property and the property of the United States, we are then no nearer a constitutional excuse for the legislation than before, for the Federal Government has no police power in the States in the protection of its property not on Federal ground. It must depend upon the States for such protection.

The fact is that the most ingenious torturing of the Federal Constitution can not develop the shadow of an excuse for such legislation as is proposed. The birds referred to are game. The Supreme Court has declared the sovereign power of the State over them, and no flight can change their character.

But I should not support the legislation, even though devilish ingenuity might devise so devious an argument as to seem to bring it within the powers of the Federal Government, for it proposes a plan and scheme in direct conflict with the plan of self-government under which we live.

Under this legislation, if it could become effective, practically every flying thing in the State I represent here, save, perhaps, the grouse and a few owls and bats and butterflies, would be under the control of the Federal Government. What is worse, the nature and character of the offenses for which the people I represent could be indicted by a Federal grand jury, summoned before a Federal court, and fined and imprisoned, would be determined by a bureau chief in the Department of Agriculture. It is true that the Secretary of Agriculture is supposed to have something to say about it; that the President, in the midst of his multitudinous duties, is supposed to sign the edict prepared in the Bureau of Biology; but our experience of the workings of bureau government teaches us that the real lawmaker would be a civil-service bureau official in no wise responsible to the people affected by his edicts.

Under the proposed legislation a bureau of the Agricultural Department would constitute crimes, punishable by fine and imprisonment in a Federal prison, a multitude of acts involving no moral turpitude and of a relatively trifling and harmless character. Not only might the killing, capturing, or taking of a wild bird or fowl at any season of the year be prohibited, but the destruction of the nest of the most insignificant member of the bird family by a mischievous boy might subject him to all the penalties I have referred to. The possession of a blackbird's wing, the wearing of a bit of bird plumage, would no doubt be held prima facie evidence of heinous crimes. Even our duck hunters in the North and quail hunters in the South, so anxious to have Uncle Sam insure them good hunting, might not be so happy if the lawmaker in the bureau concluded it would be a good idea to take advantage of this law to prohibit all killing of such birds.

Of course, gentlemen who support such a measure could, if it became a law, meet the angry protests of their outraged constituents by insisting that they were not responsible for the abuse of Federal power under it, because they do not define, except in the most general terms, the acts to be prohibited and punished. They can tell their constituents that all they did was to turn them over to the tender mercies of a Federal bureau to admonish and punish as it saw fit.

The opportunities for Federal expenditure under the bill are limitless. It places all feathered things, with few exceptions, under the protection of the Federal Government; that means, of course, that the States are prohibited from doing anything for bird protection unless they see fit to trail along after the bureau and enforce its sovereign decrees. The Federal Government would therefore be under obligation to have enough sleuths, spies, agents, and marshals in every nook and corner of the land to see that no hungry citizen shot a snipe, no small boy trapped a crow, and that no country maiden wore a bobolink's wing in her hat.

Of course, such sleuths could also be employed for the highly uplifting purpose of guarding private preserves until such time as, under the rules of an obliging bureau, a favored few were given an opportunity to kill to their heart's content. In our boyhood days we read with throbbing pulses of the mighty hunts and drives on the great game preserves of hereditary princes; all such performances pale into insignificance in the light of the glorious possibilities of gaming privileges which might be enjoyed under the regulations authorized by this act. Regulations they call them; regulations that rob every State of its sovereignty and place every citizen in jeopardy of trial, far from home, and fine and imprisonment for trifling offenses.

And what is it all about? The protection of insect-destroying birds is put forward as the foremost excuse, but read the appeals made on behalf of the law and you will find that the hunter of feathered game is the one most anxious for the legislation. The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hand is the hand of Esau. In some parts of the South the negroes are killing the game birds and rendering them scarce, so they tell us, and they want Uncle Sam to restrain them. The declaration by Uncle Sam of a closed season for colored men might be objected to as unconstitutional, but a Federally declared and enforced closed season for the feathered game the black man seeks is desired.

Too many ducks are killed in Louisiana and Mississippi and Florida, we are told, and in Texas it is claimed they allow the wholesale killing of robins; that appeals to me, for I love robins, but I have not so despaired of Texas and her sense of decency and obligation as a member of the sisterhood of States that I feel it is necessary to jeopardize our liberties and change our form of government in order to attempt to protect the robins there. We are gravely assured that our bird life will become extinct if we do not do this particular thing, and the extinction of the passenger pigeon is repeatedly held up as a fearful example of what will happen.

The extinction of the passenger pigeon is to be regretted, but no one has given us any evidence that this peculiar bird ever performed any very useful service to mankind. Its habits rendered it valueless as an insect destroyer of any particular efficiency. In large numbers it was a nuisance and it suddenly disappeared, just how or why no one knows. That the last remnant of the tribe perished at the hand of man is not at all likely. It could not adapt itself to even slightly modified environment and passed away a considerable sentimental but no great practical loss.

The passing of the great auk is another one of the awful examples of the passing of bird life which it is sought to prevent. As the great auk never came south of the Arctic Circle and never ate the bugs and insects which annoy us, our people are hardly chargeable with its destruction, or our insect pests increased thereby. We should, of course, protect bird life, but the duck and geese hunters who imagine that the Federal Government can or will restore the condition which existed before our swamps were drained and our country settled will be disappointed. Our insect-destroying birds merit and demand our protection for the useful service they render.

The value of that service has unquestionably been exaggerated; but, making due allowance for these exaggerations, they are of great value though coupled with their protection of our crops is their destruction of our grain and fruit. Our song birds should above all be protected, for they are not only insect destroyers but they add greatly to our enjoyment; they cheer and stimulate us with their songs. A considerable reduction of their numbers would be a serious loss both from a practical and sentimental standpoint.

But all these can be protected without overthrowing or defacing the Constitution, without any dangerous and unnecessary extension of Federal authority, without invasion of the domain of local government, without the creation of an army of Federal spies and agents, without delegating to a bureau of the Government the power to harrass, annoy, fine, and imprison our people for trifling offenses.

In most of the States of the Union there is a healthy and growing public sentiment favorable to the protection of bird life. In fact, the testimony is that most of the States are reasonably protecting bird life. I have faith that if the attention of the legislatures of the few States claimed to be derelict in their duty, such as the Gulf States, are appealed to they can be depended upon to pass laws which will adequately protect not only the birds temporarily sojourning there but all other birds. I refuse to believe that the people of any State in the Union are so inordinately selfish as to take advantage of their peculiar situation and condition as to slaughter birds, to the great harm and injury of other sections of the Union.

Many of the illustrations of diminishing bird life used to excuse the passage of this legislation relate to birds of the grouse family, to sage hens, prairie chickens, and quail. If there is any considerable class of birds whose protection is not made the duty of the Federal Government under the legislation in question, it is these birds. They are not in the generally accepted sense of the term migratory. Their care and protection is necessarily a local matter. They could not be legally cared for by the Federal Government under the proposed legislation, though unquestionably an effort would be made to so construe the legislation as to justify placing upon the Federal Government the cost of protecting these localized birds.

In conclusion, I have only to say that I have great faith in the capacity of the American people for self-government. I have great faith in the disposition and ability of the people in our Commonwealths to do their duty not only to their own citizens but to the entire citizenship of the Nation. There is a way to protect bird life without invoking bureaucratic Federal rule. The various States are now proceeding along these lines; and enlightened public sentiment, properly directed, can be depended upon to extend and enlarge the scope of local protection until it meets every reasonable demand and requirement of the situation.

The bill referred to is as follows:

S. 6497. An act to protect migratory game and insectivorous birds in the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That all wild geese, wild swans, brant, wild ducks, snipe, plover, woodcock, rail, wild pigeons, and all other migratory game and insectivorous birds which in their northern and southern migrations pass through or do not remain permanently the entire year within the borders of any State or Territory, shall hereafter be deemed to be within the custody and protection of the Government of the United States, and shall not be destroyed or taken contrary to regulations hereinafter provided therefor.

SEC. 2. That the Department of Agriculture is hereby authorized to adopt suitable regulations to give effect to the previous section by prescribing and fixing closed seasons, having due regard to the zones of temperature, breeding habits, and times and line of migratory flight, thereby enabling the department to select and designate suitable districts for different portions of the country within which said closed seasons it shall not be lawful to shoot or by any device kill or seize and capture migratory birds within the protection of this law, and by declaring penalties by fine of not more than $100 or imprisonment for 90 days, or both, for violations of such regulations.

SEC. 3. That the Department of Agriculture, after the preparation of said regulations, shall cause the same to be made public, and shall allow a period of three months in which said regulations may be examined and considered before final adoption, permitting, when deemed proper, public hearings thereon, and after final adoption to cause same to be engrossed and submitted to the President of the United States for approval: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect or interfere with the local laws of the States and Territories for the protection of nonmigratory game or other birds resident and breeding within their borders, nor to prevent the States and Territories from enacting laws and regulations to promote and render efficient the regulations of the Department of Agriculture provided under this statute.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of $10,000.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 23293) for the protection of the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, Colo., disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. GUGGENHEIM, and Mr. NEWLANDS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 8034) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7160) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That at 10 minutes before 1 o'clock on Wednesday, February 12, 1913, the Senate proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to take part in the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED].

[Mr. KINDRED addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has only 24 minutes remaining.

Mr. LAMB. Then I yield 24 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, no bill comes before the American Congress that is of more general interest and far-reaching importance than the Agricultural appropriation bill. Never before in the history of the country have the farmers taken the interest in their own affairs that they are taking now. They are becoming genuinely aroused to the importance of their work in the fields of agriculture. [Applause.]

In the brief time that I shall address the House to-day I will not undertake to discuss the various subjects enumerated in this Agricultural appropriation bill. I want to discuss this morning one of the most important, if not the most important, agricultural products of our country, and that is the subject of cotton. R. G. Dun & Co. in their annual report say truly that cotton has proven itself to be one of the country's most valuable assets. We export millions of dollars' worth of agricultural products every year, but it remains for cotton to give to America the balance of trade. Besides being useful in various ways amongst our own people, it occupies first place in our trade with foreign countries. I insist, Mr. Chairman, in the light of these facts, that the section of country that produces nearly two-thirds of the world's cotton supply, whose product brings to America the balance of trade, is entitled to be represented in the Diplomatic and Consular Service in the cotton-using countries of the earth by men who know something about cotton, its uses and benefits, and who could in their representative capacity exploit cotton and cotton goods to the advantage of the producer, the manufacturer, and the country at large. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to say to my friend that the day is coming pretty soon when a Democratic President will appoint men from the South in that service.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; and it is my purpose to call his attention to the situation and to urge upon him the importance of appointing competent men from the cotton-producing section, and I believe that he will do so. I want to say in this connection that the consular reports on trade conditions abroad and the information regarding the desire of various sections of procuring American products have been of great value and have increased our trade with foreign countries along many lines. I am sorry to say, however, that the cotton industry of the United States has not been and is not now represented in the Diplomatic and Consular Service.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Do they raise cotton in Cuba?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not quite sure; but I do not think they do. I want Cuba to buy her cotton and cotton goods from us, and I want some good man under the Wilson administration to represent us at Cuba, and the gentleman from Colorado, who is himself a southerner, would fill that position well. [Applause.]

Judge HULL, of Tennessee, in a magnificent speech delivered in this House February 11, 1910, called attention to a bulletin issued by the Census Bureau regarding the importance of cotton. I wish to read briefly from that bulletin:

As two-thirds of our raw material is utilized by European manufacturers in the production of goods, which are generally of a finer quality than that of the goods made here, the value of the manufactures made from the average American cotton crop is estimated at not less than $2,000,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say just here that, in view of the facts stated in the bulletin read by Judge HULL on that occasion, the people that produce such an important product as cotton is ought never to receive less than 15 cents per pound for cotton. Judge HULL, commenting upon the Consular Service as conducted to-day, said:

We have about 57 consuls general, and none are selected from cotton States to positions in countries that buy American cotton. Only three—one from Virginia and two from Missouri—are from the cotton section, and they are appointed in the lower classes of the service and to minor and unimportant stations outside of the cotton-purchasing countries.

Continuing, he said:

This Government has 241 consuls stationed in the various foreign countries. They are divided into nine classes, according to salary and importance of station to which appointed. From this entire number of consuls only five stations in European countries are filled by appointments from cotton States, and with one or two exceptions these stations are of trifling commercial importance.

I want to read here, Mr. Chairman, an article that Judge HULL read on the occasion referred to. The article was written by Mr. R. H. Watkins, a representative of the press in Washington.

There are 12 Southern States—Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia—whose cotton exports alone enable the United States to maintain a comfortable balance of trade with the world.

In all the great cotton-buying countries of Europe there is not in any diplomatic or consular position of importance and respectability a single man from a cotton-growing State representing the United States Government.

Great Britain—

He says—

buys 40 per cent of the cotton we export, yet nowhere in all the vast domain of the British Empire, weaving our cotton into fabrics for the hundreds of millions of the inhabitants of her possessions, there is not one consul from a Southern State representing the United States.

In China, where we have great hopes for development of our cotton trade, the eight consuls are from New York, Massachusetts, California, Minnesota, Indiana, and Ohio.

There are 333 Americans in the Consular Service, and of these 31 are from Southern States.

In the Diplomatic Service in positions of responsibility the number employed is 108, of which there are 13 from the Southern States.

Mr. Chairman, these facts disclose a deplorable situation. Just think of it. If a considerable per cent of these men were selected from the cotton-growing section of the country, how much value they would be not only to those who produce this great article of commerce, but to the United States in extending and expanding its trade in cotton. Let me in this connection read from Judge HULL'S speech:

Mr. Chairman, it may be remarked that the great Empire of Japan, as much as it consumes, never purchased any material quantity of cotton from the United States until 1898, when a traveling representative of American agriculture visited the buyers there and familiarized them with our cotton-trade conditions. Yet Japan used a great deal of American cotton, but it was purchased from the English dealers in London. The United Kingdom, France, and Germany purchase three-fourths of our cotton exports. Still our people who raise and sell it are, and for years have been, denied the great advantage of intelligent and efficient representation in those countries through our Consular Service.

Mr. Chairman, it is in the interest of fair play and good business sense that I demand that the South be represented in the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the United States, and I believe that the great Democrat who is soon to become President of the United States will give the South fair and due representation in the great Diplomatic and Consular Service of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the man who produces cotton in the United States renders a great service to his country and to the world, and yet he is greatly imposed upon by conditions that could be but have not yet been prevented by law. For instance, the gambling exchange, without regard to the size of the crop, uses the word "cotton" in selling two or three hundred million bales in a season. As I have said before in this House, they do not own cotton and they do not have to deliver cotton on contracts. There is an endless chain of buying and selling and settling the differences between the party buying and the party selling with money, and hence no demand is made on the cotton producer for cotton with which to fill the contract. This kind of dealing hinders the full and free operation of the law of supply and demand, and injures the price of real cotton. [Applause.] I have always contended that these gamblers on the exchange have no right to sell in unlimited quantities a fictitious stuff whose name represents the farmers' produce and never call on him for the real produce while they are fixing the market price without his aid or consent. Not only is this fictitious stuff called cotton handled in unlimited amounts, but the bear speculators send out broadcast false reports regarding the productive prospects of the crop and conditions surrounding the sale of the manufactured product. If it rains too much and the crop is damaged, the bears circulate the report that crop prospects were never better; if the farmer reduces his cotton acreage, they declare that he has planted more ground in cotton than ever before; if the drought comes and the blooms and squares parch and fall upon the ground, the bear predicts a bumper crop. These are some of the evils, Mr. Chairman, that lurk in the dark places of the exchange. If all men who are interested in cotton were compelled to deal in real cotton and to call on the cotton producer for cotton, the law of supply and demand would regulate the price, and the producer would then exercise a right that belongs to him—that of doing something toward fixing the price of his own product.

Mr. Chairman, a cotton exchange ought to be a place where real cotton is bought and sold or cotton in the process of production, where the delivery of real cotton is expected to be had; but a cotton exchange that substitutes the word "cotton" for real cotton serves no legitimate purpose. It does not help distribute the crop. It works injury to the producer and is inexcusable and indefensible. For a long time I have advocated laws looking to the regulation of the cotton exchanges of the United States, and I have contributed toward the passage of two bills through this House looking to the regulation of these exchanges; but I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Senate permitted both of these bills to die. In the Agricultural appropriation bill we have provided for the institution of a bureau of markets in the Department of Agriculture. This bureau will gather information regarding the price and demand for farm products, and this information will be printed and distributed throughout the country. Our newspapers will have access to this information, and by publishing it day after day and week after week the farmers of the South, the North, the East, and the West will be informed as to the demand for their products in the various sections of the country and the price that their produce would bring in those markets. In my judgment the work that will be done by this bureau of markets will encourage the building and operating of spot-cotton exchanges in the cotton belt. The information will be reliable information so different from the kind we get now from the bear speculators, who write their reports for the purpose of beating down the price and not for the purpose of acquainting the public with the truth of the market situation.

Mr. Chairman, there is another evil connected with the cotton exchange that I desire briefly to discuss, and that is the injury done the cotton producer by what is called the revision committee of the New York Cotton Exchange. On February 6 the Washington Star published this special from New York:

The fact that the revision committee had made no change in spot-cotton differences at the meeting last night had added somewhat to the confidence of early buyers.

Mr. Chairman, just think of it, a committee of perhaps a half dozen men on the New York exchange have it in their power to fix the difference in the price of different grades of cotton, having the bears waiting on the one hand and the bulls anxious on the other for them to announce their decision as to how many points of difference there are in the price between one grade of cotton and another.

No cotton producer is on that committee. What does this committee on fixed differences do? Why, it fixes of its own motion without regard to commercial value or fitness for spinning purposes the difference between 22 different imaginary grades of cotton. For instance, it has the power to say that a certain grade shall sell for 40 points lower than a certain other grade, and so on down, and by the action of that committee the cotton farmer is robbed of $2.20 on a bale of cotton, and on a crop of 14,000,000 bales he is robbed of more than $28,000,000. It is horrible to think of. The power to take that much money from the producer on the fixed difference between two grades of cotton is lodged in the hands of the committee on fixed differences on the New York Cotton Exchange. Just think of the robbery and plunder that is going on through this farcical process of fixed differences between 22 different grades of cotton. [Applause.] If a man buys a popular grade and wants to hold it for a better price, and thus by his holding makes it hard for the bear gambler to beat down the price, the committee on fixed differences can meet and outlaw the grade that he has bought and is holding by declaring it to be of less value than it formerly was.

Then, Mr. Chairman, they impose on the producer in another way. They have set up for their peculiar speculating purposes 22 different grades of cotton, when the fact is there are only 4 grades of cotton commonly used in buying and selling cotton in the spot markets of the country. These grades are: Good ordinary, strict good ordinary, middling, and strict middling. These 4 grades cover the grades of cotton produced on the farm, but it takes 22 imaginary grades to cover the fictitious stuff handled on the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that if there is to be a committee on fixed differences of cotton grades anywhere it should be composed of expert graders and classifiers from the ranks of the cotton producers and cotton spinners of the United States, and that committee could represent the Government in the bureau of markets. I do not mean that that committee should have the power to say that this grade is worth 20 points more or less than that grade, but simply to say that this sample of cotton does or does not belong to a certain grade and not change that decision every few days. This committee on fixed differences on the New York Cotton Exchange works untold injury to the cotton producer every year.

There is another evil in connection with the cotton industry of the United States, and that is in connection with the Government report of cotton ginned. The reports now published by the Census Bureau read:

Number of bales of cotton ginned from the growth of 1912.

Mr. Chairman, that report includes linters. This ought not to be. The cotton used by the spinner in the manufacture of cloth is the fiber cut from the seed at the first ginning and is properly called cotton. It can be used and is used for any and all kinds of spinning purposes, but linters is not cotton. It is the fuzzy covering of the seed and will not come off with the cotton fiber when the cotton is ginned. It occupies the same relation to cotton that seconds and shorts occupy to flour. It requires a different kind of gin to shave this close, clinging, fuzzy stuff from the seed. It is not used as real cotton is used, and it ought not to be counted in the ginner's report of cotton to be used for spinning purposes. It is used to make cheap mattresses, and is used as wood pulp is used, a great deal of it, in making paper, and is the finest paper material in the world. It ought to be reported as a separate and distinct item and not counted in with cotton ginned. It is misleading and confusing.

Now, the ginner's report simply says so many bales, including linters, have been ginned up to a certain time. Mr. Chairman, thousands of people, yes, millions of people do not know what linters mean, and the impression is made that it is all cotton. This impression works injury to the farmer, for linters sell for 2 or 3 cents per pound when cotton is bringing 12 cents and more per pound, and yet bear speculators use linters in their efforts to make the public believe that the ginner's report means all cotton when such is not the case. Let me illustrate: The ginner's report up to January 16, 1913, says that 13,000,000 bales have been ginned. This report is misleading and injures the cotton producer, because it leads the cotton-using world to believe that the report means 13,000,000 bales of spinnable cotton, when the fact is that nearly 400,000 of these counted as cotton bales are linters.

Take the bales of linters from the bales of real cotton and we have, up to January 16, ginned only 12,600,000 bales of spinnable cotton instead of 13,000,000 bales, as the report leads the cotton-using world to believe. Mr. Chairman, I mention this matter now for the purpose of calling the attention of the House and the country to the injustice done the cotton producer by permitting these two reports to come under the report of cotton ginned. During the next Congress I am going to try to separate these reports and let the report of spinnable cotton ginned stand in a column to itself. I want the report of cotton ginned up to a given time to mean cotton, so that the world may know that it means spinnable cotton and not linters. Now, Mr. Chairman, if we can separate cotton from linters and do away with the committee on fixed differences and regulate the cotton exchanges so that real cotton will figure in the transactions of the exchange and compel real delivery on contracts, the exchange will be a help and not a hindrance, a blessing and not a curse to the cotton producer. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. What has become of the gentleman's bill on that subject? What is the status of that bill now?

Mr. HEFLIN. I introduced a bill on the subject, so did other gentlemen from the cotton-growing States, and we made up a bill representing our views and that is the bill I referred to a moment ago. We passed that bill through the House, but it died in the Senate. We also passed a bill during the Sixty-first Congress that met the same fate in the Senate. I wish to express the belief that during the next Congress we will enact into law provisions that will strike down the evils of the gambling exchange and make all the cotton exchanges of the country legitimate, helpful agencies in the cotton world. I want to say in this connection that I do not want to put out of business any cotton exchange that is conducted on honest business principles.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman said some time ago that the bills regulating cotton exchanges which were passed by the House died in the Senate. Were they ever reported out of the Committee on Agriculture in the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think that they were.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. They are still in the Committee on Agriculture in the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is my understanding, and when I say that they died in the Senate I mean that no action was taken upon them by that body.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word about the crop of 1911. That was really a record-breaking crop. The South produced more cotton that year than ever was produced in the cotton belt before. The crop of 1912 is a short crop compared to the crop of 1911. The farmers all through the cotton belt reduced their cotton acreage, and the crop grown last year, when the tale is finally told, will be about 3,000,000 bales short of the crop of 1911. The season for gathering the crop was never better than the fall of 1912. Cotton opened rapidly throughout the cotton belt and the crop was gathered before Christmas, and the ginner's report for the 16th of January, subtracting the linters therefrom leaving 12,600,000 bales, has come within about 400,000 bales of spinable cotton of telling the tale of cotton production for the year 1912. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I want to read a letter that I sent out to different men in the cotton belt November 27, 1912:

LAFAYETTE, ALA., November 27, 1912.

MY DEAR SIR: The estimate of the cotton crop of 1912 will be announced by the Department of Agriculture December 12, and I want to have all the information possible on the subject. Please give me your estimate of the reduction in cotton acreage in your State, your opinion as to the amount of cotton that will be produced in your State, and how much cotton remains to be picked and ginned. And counting the cost of production, etc., I want your opinion as to what price you think the farmer should receive for this crop.

Please write me at Washington, D. C., House of Representatives.

With best wishes, I am,

Yours, very truly, J. THOMAS HEFLIN.

I desire now to read a letter from Hon. E. J. Watson, commissioner of agriculture of the State of South Carolina, as characteristic of the other letters that I received from Mississippi, Oklahoma, Georgia, Texas, Alabama, and North Carolina:

COLUMBIA, S. C., December 4, 1912.

Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Representative, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of November 27 has been received.

I note carefully the several requests made and beg to reply, after most careful consideration, as follows:

The cotton acreage in this State in the year 1911 was 2,705,000. This year there was a reduction of at least 10 per cent in this acreage.

The production of South Carolina this year will not, in my opinion, exceed 1,300,000 running bales, and I doubt very much if it will reach that figure.

Up to December 1 more than 90 per cent of the crop had been picked and practically all of that picked had been ginned. Indeed, practically the entire crop had been harvested and sent to the gin.

Taking carefully into consideration everything relating to the cost of production and marketing, in my opinion the producer of cotton is entitled to and ought to receive at least 15 cents per pound for this year's crop.

Trusting that the above is the information desired, believe me,

Very truly, yours,

E. J. WATSON, Commissioner.

There was 10 per cent reduction in cotton acreage in Mississippi, 25 per cent in Oklahoma, 10 per cent in South Carolina, 15 per cent in Georgia, 2 per cent in Texas, 20 per cent in Alabama, and 15 per cent in North Carolina. In spite of these facts the bear speculators all during the year circulated reports to the effect that cotton acreage had been increased and that we would make another big crop like that of 1911. Mr. Chairman, but for the false reports circulated by bear gamblers on the exchanges and the fictitious stuff they are allowed to handle and call cotton, the law of supply and demand would have operated through this selling season and the cotton producers would have gotten a cent and a half or two cents a pound more than they received for this crop. The spindles of this and other countries have been operating full time and the cotton-goods trade has been good everywhere, and the price that has obtained for cotton goods justify these gentlemen who have written to me from all over the cotton belt and justify me in the demand for 15 cents per pound for cotton. [Applause.] I want to educate the country to the fact that the cost of production is so great that the cotton producer can not realize a fair and reasonable profit unless he does receive 15 cents per pound. The men who produce this product that brings to America the balance of trade are entitled to fair treatment at the hands of the American Congress, and the House has manifested its desire to see justice done to the cotton producer. It has gone on record voting for a law that would protect him from the evils of the gambling exchange, and I thank you gentleman for that great body of men who produce cotton, men who simply want a fair deal, reasonable prices, and living profits. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. LAMB. Now, Mr. Chairman, that we are through with eloquence, poetry, and State rights, I ask that the bill be read for amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] reserves a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture why it is that a solicitor at $5,000 is carried in the paragraph, and also a chief clerk carried at $3,000, with an additional salary of $500, making $3,500 as a total salary for the chief clerk?

Mr. LAMB. That has been the custom for the last four or five Congresses and has been enacted into law.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that his bill last year, when he brought it in, carried a salary of $4,500 for the solicitor?

Mr. LAMB. I think $500 was put on in the Senate last year and agreed to in conference.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the solicitor and the salary carried therefor. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire——

Mr. LAMB. I will ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order. I do not think this salary is subject to a point of order at all. It is the current law.

Mr. FOWLER. My point of order in brief is——

Mr. LAMB. There is no change from last year at all in this, and I do not think the point of order will lie.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the solicitor in this bill had been carried in rather a loose way without any authority of law. By the act of 1910, which was a general appropriation bill, it was provided that hereafter certain duties should be discharged by the solicitor. In the last appropriation bill as it was reported to the House his salary was carried at $4,500. A point of order was made against this solicitor, not as to the salary, but as to the authority to carry a solicitor therein, the point being made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. It was ably argued here upon the floor of the House, and Mr. BORLAND, at that time being in the chair, ruled that the law of 1910, which was a general appropriation bill containing the word "hereafter" and providing that certain duties should "hereafter" be performed by a solicitor, authorized the office of solicitor, but the question as to the salary was not raised at all.

I make the point of order against that part of the paragraph because it carries more than the law carried in 1910 for this place when it had some kind of authority in permanent law for its existence as a portion of the paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. If my colleague will allow me to interrupt right there, I think I can save time by stating that this whole matter of the solicitorship was discussed here last year, and the authority to appoint him at all was challenged. The discussion to which he has referred, on the point of order made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], was thrashed out here, and it was plainly shown that not only did the law authorize the creating of this office, but that the very act creating a Department of Agriculture authorized the appointment of this solicitor. Section 523 of the statutes places it absolutely beyond question. So there is nothing in the point of order, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not making a point of order here for the purpose of consuming time, but I am making it because there is a foundation for it. I repeat that the bill as reported from the committee to the House last year carried only $4,500. I assert that the bill in 1910, which carried with it some authority for creating a solicitor, carried with it only a salary of $4,500. I have a quotation from the law as passed then. The salary of the solicitor at that time carried in the act of 1910, volume 36, page 416, was $4,500.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FOWLER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman state that there is any statute fixing in so many words the salary of the solicitor of the Agricultural Department, or is his appointment left to the Secretary of Agriculture at such salary as Congress may appropriate for?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, there is no law creating the office of solicitor and fixing the salary.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I thought.

Mr. FOWLER. If it were left to the Secretary of Agriculture to make the appointment, there is a limitation upon his power which is fixed by permanent law, prohibiting him from fixing a salary, for any office that he may create, above $3,000.

So, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that in the act of 1910, reported in the Statutes at Large, volume 36, page 416, there was a clause saying that certain duties hereafter shall be performed by a solicitor. Chairman BORLAND considered that to mean that the office of solicitor was created. At that time the bill carried a salary of $4,500. In harmony with that law the honorable Committee on Agriculture reported its bill during the last session of Congress for a solicitor at $4,500.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the universal ruling of the Chair, so far as I have been able to understand, that when an office has been created, or where it has been carried in an appropriation bill and the salary fixed therein, there can be no change thereafter, however many times it may have been in the current law, because of the fact that if it were permitted to increase these salaries indiscriminately there would be no end to the increase of salaries at the caprice of any who might see fit to favor his friend or to favor an individual.

Mr. Chairman, I have the ruling and the debate on this question before me, and if there is any question as to the correctness of my statement, I desire to read the report of the proceedings of the last session of this Congress upon this identical question, wherein the burden of contention was upon the right of the committee to provide for a solicitor and not upon the question of the salary. The Senate, after the bill passed the House, increased the salary from $4,500 to $5,000.

Mr. LAMB. That increase was made in the Senate last year. It was inserted by the conferees. Now, if I understand the gentleman right, it was not challenging the position of solicitor, but the question of our right to give him $5,000, and makes a point of order on that.

Mr. FOWLER. My position is not against the provision for the solicitor, but against the authority to increase salaries.

Mr. LAMB. The same authority applies to the solicitor as to any other officer. We were asked to increase the salaries of all of them, but we refused to do it.

Mr. FOWLER. When the office was created the salary was $4,500. Now you seek to increase it by making it $5,000

Mr. LAMB. It was $5,000 last year.

Mr. FOWLER. You are trying to change existing law.

Mr. LAMB. Not at all.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not know whether I have made myself clear, Mr. Chairman. The Chair was investigating the subject while I was discussing it. I desire to say that there was, in 1910, according to the ruling of the Chair, a permanent law passed creating the officer of Solicitor at a salary of $4,500. This is an increase of a salary; it is changing permanent law, which I say this committee can not do.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this same question was discussed here last year. We relied partially, but not wholly, upon section 523, which says:

SEC. 523. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk, and he shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar officers in other departments of the Government; and he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons for such time as their services may be needed, including chemists, botanists, and other persons skilled in the natural sciences pertaining to agriculture.

We lodged our contention last year not entirely on this section, but in conjunction with the word "hereafter." There is nothing in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois as to the increase of salary to $5,000, for we find that last year, and we continued the salary, as we had a right to do. I ask for a ruling.

Mr. FOWLER. But the Commissioner of Agriculture has not fixed this salary nor created the office. This Congress created the office in 1910 and fixed the salary at $4,500, and the committee is trying to increase it now in defiance of existing law.

Mr. LAMB. Congress changed the amount of salary last year.

Mr. FOWLER. That is current law and not permanent law.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. COX. If I understand correctly, the office never was created until 1910?

Mr. FOWLER. That is according to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. COX. And it fixed the salary at $4,500?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's point of order is against the increase of the salary from $4,500 to $5,000?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman from Illinois is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers the controversy which took place in the House on the consideration of the agricultural bill last year. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] directed a point of order against this item in the bill. Those supporting the item predicated that support upon the original act creating the Department of Agriculture, which authorized the head of that department to do certain things, and upon a statute that gave certain authority to various heads of departments; also upon the language contained in the agricultural appropriation act of 1910. That language is this:

Solicitor, $4,500; hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the solicitor.

The recollection of the Chair is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] presided over the committee at that time and held that the point of order was not well taken, and suggested that even if the original act, or the provision of the statute to which I have referred, was not sufficient to authorize the provision, that the appropriation act of 1910 was in itself sufficient, because while it was an appropriation act still there was legislation on it, and the provision with respect to the solicitor was not limited to that particular year, but contained the word "hereafter."

The Chair reads from section 3687 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4:

In the absence of a general law fixing a salary the amount appropriated in the last appropriation bill has been held to be the legal salary, although in violation of the general rule that the appropriation bill makes law only for the year.

If this position had been created by a separate and distinct statute establishing the position and fixing a definite salary for it, that salary would govern, and if a committee in the preparation of an appropriation bill should increase the salary or the allowance for that salary at any subsequent time and a point of order should be made against it, the point of order would be good. But as the Chair understands the language of the appropriation act of 1910, it did not attempt to fix a definite salary for the position of solicitor, and under the precedent that the Chair has cited, inasmuch as Congress in its last appropriation bill fixed the salary at $5,000, it is the opinion of the Chair that that would be the law with respect to the salary, and, therefore, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the Chair that it has been repeatedly held that where a salary has been carried in an appropriation bill without specific law therefor, it does not fix the salary at all, and that the one objecting to the salary may go back to the time when the office was first created and date from the salary fixed at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that would be true if there existed some specific, separate statute that created that position and fixed a certain definite salary for it, but as the Chair understands the situation that condition does not prevail. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, as to the chief clerk, there is an effort to change his salary from a fixed law of $2,000 to $3,500. I make the point of order against the salary of the chief clerk. In the creation of the Department of Agriculture there was a provision for one chief clerk at a salary of $2,000. The revision of the statute has gone on from time to time up to 1874, and has on each occasion in the revision carried a salary of $2,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. A point of order was pending against the salary of the solicitor, which the Chair overruled. After the Chair had rendered his decision upon that question the gentleman from Illinois began to argue upon the same question, and after he had argued for a moment or two he made another point of order against the salary of the chief clerk of the department. I make the point of order that he can not raise a point of order after a discussion has been had upon the question.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order in the first instance against the entire paragraph, as the record will show.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the point of order of the gentleman is in order.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct in that, and I would like to answer his point of order on the salary of the clerk. That has been carried for the last 10 years in the appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Was provision made for a chief clerk in the general law?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes, Mr. Chairman; and I have that law before me. I read now from the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 521:

> The Department of Agriculture shall be under the charge of a Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled, etc. There shall be one chief clerk at a salary of $2,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Virginia if there has been any change by law in the amount of that salary?

Mr. LAMB. It has been carried in the appropriation bill for the last 10 years.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman understands that where there is a law fixing a definite amount for a salary, the mere fact that it has been carried at a different sum in an appropriation bill will not sustain it if a point of order is made against it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the $500 additional as the custodian of the building is subject to a point of order, but the $3,000, of course, is not.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from South Carolina refer the Chair to any statute changing the salary of this chief clerk?

Mr. LEVER. No; I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina know that there has been such a change?

Mr. LEVER. No; the gentleman does not know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the attention of the Chair is directed to a change in the law increasing the salary [a pause] the point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order now against "one special agent on exhibits, $3,000."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order and let me give an explanation which will satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. This is a new place, I admit. There is need of an employee to care for and prepare the department's exhibit for national and international expositions and for State fairs. A man not only possessing executive ability but also trained professionally as an agrostologist is required in this instance. It was necessary to offer the salary indicated to retain the services of such an employee. The salary of the official now performing these duties is met by several bureaus. They have had this agent all the while and it has been divided between the Bureaus of Animal Industry, Forestry, Chemistry, and the Secretary's office, and they together have paid this man's salary. Now that is consolidated in the office of the Secretary, and the salary of this new official now performing these duties is paid by the Secretary's office under this appropriation instead of by these other three.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in other words it is not a new place; it is simply a change of title. It changes the title from that of agrostologist.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon the point of order. This is a new place, and yet a new place authorized by law. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to section 523, which has already been read to the Chair, in which the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized, as Congress may from time to time provide, to employ employees with salaries of similar offices in other departments of the Government; and he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons for such time as their services may be needed, and in addition to that I would like to call the attention of the Chair to section 169 of the Revised Statutes:

> Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, or such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

The Chair has uniformly held on that proposition that Congress had the right under section 169 of the Revised Statutes to employ men to do the work in the various executive departments of the Government. I might cite the Chair to a ruling on December 6, 1912, third session Sixty-second Congress, where Chairman GARNER ruled as follows:

> It seems to the Chair that the first question for the Chair to ascertain is whether or not section 169 of the Revised Statutes authorizes these clerks or whether or not the head of a department has the right to employ those five clerks. In 1906 Mr. Hull of Iowa was in the chair, and this identical question came up and was decided by him on a point of order made by Mr. Tawney upon clerks of a similar nature in the War Department. Mr. Hull held at that time, quoting section 169, that where the statute had authorized the heads of departments to employ clerks and other laborers, that it was in order, and he overruled the point of order. He used this language:
> "The first question is, What law authorizes this appropriation? The only law referred to is that contained in section 169 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:"
> Here he quotes the statute. This is a similar case, where the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] cites the statute, 169, as authority for this legislation.

It has been held time and time again, Mr. Chairman, that under the broad language of section 169 the heads of the various executive departments of the Government have the right to employ such number of clerks and other employees as Congress may from time to time provide. I therefore contend that this provision is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the precedents are almost uniform to the effect that, under the authority of the act creating the Department of Agriculture, as well as under the authority of the article of the statute which has been read here, it is within the province of this committee to consider any item on an appropriation bill to create and care for such an employee as this, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the secretary be authorized to correct the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that in this first paragraph there is no appropriation made for a chief clerk at all.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, that is what I want recognition for now.

I desire to amend this paragraph, page 2, lines 1 and 2, by inserting in place of that which is stricken out:

> Chief clerk, $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend, page 2, line 2, by inserting "$2,000."

Mr. FOWLER. So that it will read:

> Chief clerk, $2,000; private secretary of the Secretary of Agriculture—

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I ask that the amendment be reported again, and I ask also for order. It is absolutely impossible to hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

> Page 2, line 2, insert "$2,000."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by making it $3,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] fixing the salary of the chief clerk at $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Weather Bureau: One chief of bureau, $6,000; 1 assistant chief of bureau, $3,250; 1 chief clerk and executive assistant, $3,000; 1 chief of printing division, $2,500; 2 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 8 clerks, class 4; 9 clerks, class 3; 21 clerks, class 2; 30 clerks, class 1; 22 clerks, at $1,000 each; 9 clerks, at $900 each; 5 copyists or typewriters, at $900 each; 1 telegraph operator, $1,200; 2 assistant foremen of division, at $1,600 each; 1 lithographer, $1,500; 3 lithographers, at $1,200 each; 6 compositors, at $1,250 each; 14 printers, at $1,200 each; 11 printers, at $1,000 each; 4 folders and feeders, at $720 each; 1 chief mechanic, $1,400; 5 skilled mechanics, at $1,200 each; 7 skilled mechanics, at $1,000 each; 1 skilled mechanic, $840; 1 skilled mechanic, $720; 6 skilled artisans, at $840 each; 1 engineer, $1,300; 1 fireman and steam fitter, $840; 6 firemen, at $720 each; 1 captain of the watch, $1,000; 1 electrician, $1,200; 1 gardener, $840; 2 repairmen, at $840 each; 8 repairmen, at $720 each; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; 17 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $720 each; 6 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $660 each; 27 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 87 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 5 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $450 each; 27 messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 charwoman, $360; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $323,260.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph. I make the point of order against the salary of the chief of bureau, $6,000, and also one assistant chief of bureau at $3,250, and one chief clerk at $3,000, and also one chief of printing division, $2,500.

Mr. Chairman, in 1891 there was a permanent act passed, on March 3 of that year, creating the Chief of the Weather Bureau at a salary of $4,500. I desire to make a point of order against the Chief of the Weather Bureau at the salary of $6,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Illinois the statute at hand?

Mr. FOWLER. I have reference to the act of March 3, 1891, $4,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] if he knows there has been any change in that salary as fixed in the act of 1891?

Mr. LAMB. Not a thing that I know of. I do not think so.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois read the act.

Mr. LAMB. Section 4 uses this language:

That the Weather Bureau shall hereafter consist of one Chief of Weather Bureau and such civilian employees as Congress may annually provide for and as may be necessary to properly perform the duties devolving upon said bureau by law, and the chief of said bureau shall receive an annual compensation and be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of that act?

Mr. LAMB. It does not give the date. It is Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, section 653.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I made a thorough investigation of the statute last night and this morning, in connection with the librarian, and we were unable to find any section which changed the salary from $4,500.

Mr. LAMB. It does not fix any salary.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Illinois refer the Chairman to the law that fixes the salary of this officer to $4,500?

Mr. FOWLER. It creates a salary of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, and fixes the salary of four captains and four lieutenants. I am reading my notes as taken from the statute.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman read from the statute?

Mr. FOWLER. It is the act of March 3, 1891, creating a Chief of the Weather Bureau and his assistants.

Mr. Chairman, if there is any doubt in the minds of the gentlemen of the committee or the Chair, I am perfectly willing that this point should be passed with the point of order pending.

Mr. LAMB. What is the request of the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair understand the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. I say, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any doubt about the permanent law, as I have indicated, I am perfectly willing to let the point of order be passed and be considered as pending until gentlemen of the committee can satisfy themselves.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman to what his point of order is directed? How far does it go?

Mr. FOWLER. I think I shall confine it only to the salary of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, although there are many other changes.

Mr. MANN. Is that the request of the gentleman—that the point of order as to the salary of the Chief of the Weather Bureau be passed over temporarily, the other points of order not being pressed?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I accept that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] with respect to the particular item of the Chief of the Weather Bureau is that it be passed over temporarily, and that the other points of order reserved by him are withdrawn.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Weather Bureau: For fuel, lights, repairs, and other expenses for the care and preservation of the public buildings and grounds and the improvement of the existing public buildings of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington; for stationery and blank books, furniture and repairs to same, and freight and express charges; for subsistence, care, and purchase of horses and vehicles, and repairs of harness, for official purposes only; for advertising, dry goods, twine, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, washing towels, and other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for in the city of Washington, $25,000.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. I see the total carried by the bill this year is $17,593,275. How does this compare with the last year's bill of a similar nature?

Mr. MANN. This is an increase of about $900,000 over the bill of last year.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Weather Bureau: For carrying into effect in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Burmuda, the provisions of an act approved October 1, 1890, so far as they relate to the weather service transferred thereby to the Department of Agriculture, and for every expenditure requisite for and incident to the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of meteorological observation stations, including cooperation with other bureaus of the Government and societies and institutions of learning for the dissemination of meteorological information, as follows:

For the employment of professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, section directors, research observers, observers, assistant observers, operators, skilled mechanics, repairmen, station agents, messengers, messenger boys, laborers, and other necessary employees, $585,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen will notice that in the paragraph just read provision is made for the weather service, based partly upon observations in the United States, in the West Indies or adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda.

We have had our attention called in recent days to Bermuda, and for the first time in the history of the country we, probably, most of us, have learned some notion with reference to where Bermuda is. This side of the House, the Republican side of the House, has come to have great respect for Bermuda [applause], and I dare say we have learned enough about it to have learned how to spell it. But it seems the Democratic side of the House has so little interest in Bermuda and in the gentleman who has been sojourning there that they have not even learned how the word is spelled. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, it was a Republican printer who did that. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. It was a Republican printer who knew how to follow copy, and it was a Democratic committee that did not know how to spell the word in preparing the copy. [Laughter.]

I waited until after the item had been passed in the House, with no suggestion coming from the Democratic side of the House to change the spelling, because they had not yet learned how Bermuda is spelled. When Bermuda attracted their attention in the prints, they did not notice the word; they were so engaged in hoping that the gentleman then sojourning in Bermuda would provide jobs for them hereafter that they forgot how it was spelled. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMB. It is to be hoped, Mr. Chairman, that when the Democrats have had the experience that the Republicans have had they will not only be better spellers, but they will be able to do other things better, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, it is to be hoped that they will be better spellers, at least.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In a moment. I can not yield now. I hope that some one will learn that they have spelled Bermuda "B-u-rm-u-d-a," and it has passed the House that way, although now——

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the Senate amend it——

Mr. MANN. Having learned that this is spelled wrong in the bill, the gentlemen can send out and get a gazetteer and learn how it is spelled, or the Republican Senate can do what they have often had to do before—correct it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. If the gentlemen of the House desire to know how "Bermuda" is spelled, they can undoubtedly find out by referring to the tariff hearings, because I believe that for the second time in the history of the United States Government representatives both of Bermuda and of the Bahamas—foreign countries—instead of coming before the State Department, have come now directly, as they came at the time of the hearings on the Wilson bill, from their own parliaments to a committee of the House of Representatives to advocate their interests in the tariff revision, and in the tariff hearings gentlemen will find the spelling both as to Bermuda and the Bahamas. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I object to having my last two words stricken out. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will make it three. I wanted to suggest, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that if these gentlemen that he has referred to have been before the Committee on Ways and Means their evidence is in print, and the whole world can know what they have said to the committee. In former times, however, when the gentleman's party was revising the tariff, secret meetings were held and these men were able to fix up a tariff bill to suit themselves.

And so if the Democrats have done what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] now sees fit to find fault with, it has been done in the open and in public. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I want to say that I refer my friend from Connecticut to the transaction that took place in another body as recorded and stated by the late Senator from Iowa, Mr. Dolliver, when he made some remarks upon the bill in the Senate.

Mr. HILL. I want to refer the gentleman, in answer to his own statement, to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] in the last session, in which he stated, in regard to the manner of making up the bills which were then pending, that nearly a thousand private interviews had been given. [Applause on the Republican side.] At the same time public hearings with reference to these pending bills were absolutely refused.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but the difference between the two is this: That the private hearings before the Democratic committee were not written into the bill, but it is shown that the private hearings before the Republican committee resulted in the writing of a part of the Republican bill by men who were doing it in the interest of their own pockets. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did anybody ever charge the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] with having taken a very active part in any of those matters?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether they have or not.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I must insist that this discussion is out of order, as the time of the gentleman has expired, and I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the acquisition of sites outside of the District of Columbia and the erection thereon of two buildings for use as Weather Bureau observatories, to be constructed under the supervision of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, plans and specifications to be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and for all necessary labor, materials, and expenses connected with this work, $40,000.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee about the meaning of the language on the top of page 7:

For the acquisition of sites outside of the District of Columbia.

Does that mean anywhere in the world outside of the District of Columbia?

Mr. LAMB. It is for the erection of additional Weather Bureau observatories outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. COOPER. But where outside of the District of Columbia? Those words might mean anywhere in the world.

Mr. LAMB. Wherever the Secretary of Agriculture or the Weather Bureau shall conclude to erect the buildings, at the most advantageous places. There are 8 or 10 places in competition. From the evidence before our committee it seems as if five or six were needed, but we did not think that at this session of Congress we could create more than two.

Mr. COOPER. Where are those to be?

Mr. LAMB. It is not decided positively, but we think, perhaps, the most important are Sandy Hook, N. Y., and Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to line 9, page 5, to correct the spelling of the word "Bermuda." It is spelled in the bill with a "u" in the first syllable and it should be an "e."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will make the correction.

The Clerk read as follows:

And hereafter officials and employees of the Weather Bureau may be transferred from the field service to service in the same bureau in the District of Columbia without regard to the civil-service rule of apportionment; and officials and employees of the Weather Bureau, when transferred from one station to another for official duty, shall be allowed all traveling expenses authorized by existing laws applicable to said bureau, notwithstanding any changes in appointments that may be required by such transfers.

Mr. COX. I reserve a point of order on that. I think it is rather peculiar.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, let me explain. This paragraph has been inserted to cover the exchange of employees between the city of Washington and the field, and the payment of traveling expenses of employees transferred from one station to another. The work carried on by the Weather Bureau is of such a character as to render it desirable that its officials and employees at the central office be fully familiar with the work performed at the field stations, and vice versa. Under the application of existing civil-service rules there is no difficulty about transferring employees from the city of Washington to the field, but under existing laws and regulations the transfer from the field force to the city of Washington is rendered difficult and is often impossible. Under the present ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury an employee transferred from one State to another with either promotion or reduction in salary, or whose status or designation is changed without any change in salary, can not be paid his traveling expenses after the new appointment is issued to him, as such appointment is held to create a new position, and the employee is required to report for duty at his new station without expense to the Government. Changes in salary or status are often necessary incidents to the transfer of employees from one State to another, and the application of this ruling is highly embarrassing to the official administration of the bureau. The proposed paragraph will be a great gain toward efficiency in the operation of the Weather Bureau. I think that explanation, which is the one furnished by the department, ought to be satisfactory to my friend.

Mr. COX. The sum and substance of the whole matter is that you propose to change and completely break down the law governing the civil service without regard to the rules of apportionment. That will be the effect of it; it simply destroys the whole apportionment now existing under the civil-service law. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Chair will call attention to section 4 of chapter 1266 of the laws of 1890, which reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Weather Bureau shall hereafter consist of one chief of the Weather Bureau and such civilian employees as Congress may annually provide for and as may be necessary to properly perform the duties devolving on said bureau by law, and the chief of said bureau shall receive an annual compensation of $4,500, and be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Unless the gentleman from Virginia or some other gentleman can show that there has been some amendment of this statute, the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LEVER. As far as I have been able to examine, Mr. Chairman, I have no law except the current appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment making the salary $4,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by inserting after the word "bureau," in line 16, the figures "$4,500."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,500; 1 editor and compiler, $2,250; 6 clerks, class 4; 1 clerk, $1,680; 12 clerks, class 3; 2 clerks, at $1,500 each; 22 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,380 each; 3 clerks, at $1,320 each; 1 clerk, $1,300; 1 clerk, $1,260; 39 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,100; 1 clerk, $1,080; 50 clerks, at $1,000 each; 2 clerks, at $960 each; 64 clerks, at $900 each; 1 architect, $2,000; 1 architect, $900; 1 illustrator, $1,400; 4 inspector's assistants, at $1,000 each; 12 inspector's assistants, at $840 each; 1 laboratory assistant, $1,200; 2 laboratory assistants, at $900 each; 1 laboratory helper, $1,020; 2 laboratory helpers, at $840 each; 1 laboratory helper, $720; 1 laboratory helper, $600; 1 laboratory helper, $480; 1 instrument maker, $1,200; 1 carpenter, $1,100; 2 carpenters, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger and custodian, $1,200; 1 messenger and custodian, $1,000; 9 messengers, skilled laborers, or laborers, at $840 each; 10 messengers, skilled laborers, or laborers, at $720 each; 23 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 6 messengers or messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 33 skilled laborers, at $900 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 7 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 1 skilled laborer or laborer, $780; 2 laborers or messengers, at $660 each; 9 laborers, messengers, or messenger boys, at $600 each; 3 laborers, messengers, or messenger boys, at $540 each; 1 watchman, $720; 1 charwoman, $600; 1 charwoman, $540; 11 charwomen, at $480 each; 4 charwomen, at $360 each; 1 charwoman, $300; 2 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $359,250.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph. The salary of the chief of bureau is fixed at $5,000, which is an attempt to change existing law. Also the salary of one chief clerk at $2,500, which is another effort to change existing law. The act of May 29, 1884, created a chief of this bureau at a salary of $3,000 and a chief clerk at a salary of $1,500. The act of 1889, after the Agriculture Department was put under the head of a Secretary, carried these salaries, to wit: One chief, at a salary of $3,000, and one chief clerk, at a salary of $1,500. I submit the statute, Mr. Chairman, as to the correctness of my statement.

Mr. LAMB. The same law applies as to all the others.

Mr. FOWLER. The act of February 2, 1889, carries the same provision.

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LAMB. I will offer amendments restoring the old salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 7, line 21, by inserting, after the word "bureau," the figures "$3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 7, line 21, by inserting, after the word "clerk," the figures "$1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and the alteration of buildings thereon, the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals, $620,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 12, page 11, the figures "$620,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$820,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the item that follows this one reads:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $325,000.

According to the testimony of Dr. Melvin the total loss last year by cattle in the United States from this disease, by depreciation through sickness and loss, was in the neighborhood of $25,000 or $40,000; and this committee proposes to appropriate $325,000 to eradicate this disease.

Mr. LAMB. If the gentleman will allow me, I think he has dropped a figure. I think he means two hundred and fifty or three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. GOOD. I call attention to the testimony before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture. Last year the total loss in the United States, according to the testimony of Dr. Melvin, of hogs by cholera was to the value of $42,042,000; yet there is not a single penny appropriated in this bill for the prevention and eradication of hog cholera. I have read with deepest interest the hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture with regard to the efforts of the department to prevent and eradicate hog cholera and to stamp out that disease. I was amazed to find that while, according to the testimony of Dr. Melvin, there is a perfect serum which will absolutely prevent hog cholera, not a single penny is here appropriated to prevent or to stamp out this disease. Dr. Melvin testified before that committee as follows:

Mr. SLOAN. What, if any, appropriation is there that could be used in extending and increasing these demonstrations? Is there any such fund as that?

Dr. MELVIN. There is a fund, but the estimates as submitted to the committee were only sufficient to provide for work which we now have on hand and not for increasing this demonstration work. We would not be able to conduct or increase this demonstration work without a considerable increase in those funds.

Mr. SLOAN. If an increase in appropriations should be made, is your bureau so organized that it has or could have available competent men who could be sent to different points in the several States to make these demonstrations?

Dr. MELVIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. If such funds were provided and such competent persons sent, in your opinion would it be wisely spent money looking toward the reduction of this very large annual loss which you have recited to the committee?

Dr. MELVIN. I think undoubtedly it would. I think that if we were provided with funds, so we go into several States and take up a considerable section, involving three or four counties in a block, and there demonstrate that losses from cholera need not necessarily exist, that it would be of immense value to the country. I think we could demonstrate to the States that by careful organization and the use of an efficient serum that the cholera could be reduced to a minimum and probably eventually eradicated.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I am interested to know if there is other testimony corroborative of that of Dr. Melvin which goes to show that this serum really cures or prevents hog cholera. I am interested to know.

Mr. GOOD. I think Dr. Dorsett's testimony corroborates that of Dr. Melvin. I understand that there are men outside of this chamber who do not want a single penny expended by the Government to prevent hog cholera. While there were $42,000,000 worth of hogs lost last year by cholera, that does not measure the loss to the farmers. I suppose the farmers who raise hogs expended $10,000,000 more in buying patent medicines that were useless, and the patent-medicine manufacturers do not want a single penny appropriated that this disease may be effectually stamped out. If we are going to do something for the farmers of States like Illinois, where they lost last year $8,000,000 because of hog cholera; of States like Iowa, where they lost $7,000,000 through cholera, we ought to begin now. I can appreciate that some of the gentlemen on that side are not interested in these matters, and why? Let us take the State of Virginia, for instance. If my recollection serves me right, only 3.6 per cent of the hogs of Virginia were lost by cholera, while in Illinois 20 per cent were lost by cholera.

Mr. LAMB. Oh, the State of Virginia takes better care of its hogs.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; hog cholera could never overtake one of those razorbacks. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, it looks as though a personal explanation would be good at this point. I will state that I lost 200 hogs on one farm—Berkshires, and not razorbacks.

Mr. MANN. That is because the gentleman raises good hogs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, in no spirit of controversy, I would like to know if the gentleman does not concede that the serum for the hog-cholera cure is still in a very experimental stage.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will concede that it is no more in experimental stage than is the cure for southern cattle ticks in an experimental stage, and I will refer the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED] to the page of the hearings with regard to the loss by cattle ticks. On page 8, Dr. Melvin says that the loss through cattle-tick fever has been variously estimated at from twenty-five to forty million dollars, while the loss from hog cholera last year was $42,000,000. I hope the gentleman who is chairman of this great committee will be as generous to the raisers of hogs as he is to the raisers of southern cattle in this regard. If he wants to do something to reduce the high cost of living, let him appropriate a small sum—a mere drop in the bucket as compared with the great loss in the country—in order that we may prevent this great loss of live stock by hog cholera.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks the statement of Dr. Melvin with regard to the loss of hogs by cholera and the results of the experiments in treating hogs with this anticholera serum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including a part of the hearings referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1913.

PARTIAL SUMMARY OF RESULTS OBTAINED FROM APPLICATION OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY'S ANTICHOLERA SERUM.

[All animals were kept under ordinary farm conditions.]

October 19, 1908 (Michigan): Infected herd. When visited 1 hog had died, 7 were sick, and 21 apparently well. Treated, 23 (3 of which were sick). Untreated, 5.

Results: Treated, survived, 22 or approximately 96 per cent; untreated, survived, none.

October 20, 1908 (Michigan): Herd slightly infected. Treated, 11; untreated, 4.

Results: Treated, all remained well; untreated, all died.

July 15, 1909 (Maryland): Experiment. Owner had lost nearly all of his herd. He bought 11 pigs and agreed to have some of these treated by the serum simultaneous method and others inoculated with virus alone to serve as checks. Treated, 7; virus alone, 3.

Results: All treated animals remained well; all virus-alone animals died.

August 25, 1909 (Virginia): Data incomplete on account of remoteness of the herd, but reported that all treated animals remained well, while all untreated ones died.

September 15, 1909 (Virginia): Data incomplete. All treated animals remained well; all untreated animals died.

December 6, 1909 (Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station): Herd infected. Treated 43, many of which were sick; untreated, none.

Results: Survived, 29, or approximately 68 per cent; died, 14, or approximately 32 per cent.

December 21–22, 1909 (Virginia): Herd very badly infected. About 35 animals had died, and practically all of the survivors were showing symptoms of hog cholera to a greater or less degree. Treated, 113, many of which were sick; untreated, 179.

Results: Treated, survived, 79, or approximately 69.91 per cent; treated, died, 34, or approximately 30 per cent; untreated, survived, 111, or approximately 62 per cent; untreated, died, 68, or approximately 38 per cent.

This data is incomplete, as at last report some of the untreated animals were said to have been "looking badly."

February 18, 1910 (West Virginia Hospital for Insane): Herd infected. Treated, 47 (many of which showed early symptoms of disease); untreated, 52.

Results: Treated, survived, 36, or approximately 76 per cent; treated, died, 11, or approximately 24 per cent; untreated, died, 52, or 100 per cent.

April 16, 1910 (Maryland): Disease just beginning. Treated, 34; untreated, 16.

Results: Final report stated that all treated animals remained well. No mention was made as to the untreated ones.

April 16, 1910 (second herd, Maryland): Data incomplete; no detailed final report. Only the general statement received that all treated animals remained well.

July 9, 1910 (Iowa): Owner had lost the greater portion of his herd and had procured 14 pigs from one of his neighbors for this experiment. The simultaneous method was employed. Treated by, 11; virus alone, 3.

Results: Treated, survived, 8 or approximately 73 per cent; treated, died, 3, or approximately 27 per cent. All virus-alone animals died.

July 21, 1910 (Nebraska): Infected herd. Data incomplete. The final report was to the effect that nearly all treated animals survived. No statement as to the untreated ones.

November 12, 1910 (Washington, D. C., jail): Herd badly infected. Treated, 18; untreated, exact number not known.

Results: Treated, survived, 73, or approximately 90 per cent; treated, died, 9, or approximately 10 per cent.

(The report on the untreated hogs is incomplete, but as near as could be determined 73 per cent died and 27 per cent survived.)

March 3, 1911 (Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station): Herd slightly infected. Treated, 42 (3 of which showed the early symptoms of hog cholera); untreated, none.

Results: Treated, survived, 41, or approximately 98 per cent; treated, died, 1, or approximately 2 per cent. (This animal was one of those which were sick when treated.)

July, 1908, Kansas City, Kans. Experiment. Thirty-five young shoats were purchased from a farm where hog cholera had not existed. These pigs, having been carried to the Kansas City stockyards, and being in charge of a committee appointed by the exchange, were treated as follows: Twenty-two were injected with anti-hog-cholera serum prepared by the bureau. Four were injected with virulent hog-cholera blood. Nine were not treated in any manner. All were placed in a pen together. As was expected, the 4 pigs inoculated with the virulent blood contracted hog cholera within a short time and all died. The 9 "checks" contracted hog cholera from those which were inoculated with hog-cholera blood, and they also died. The 22 pigs treated with the serum remained well, with the exception of one or two, which were slightly affected on one or two days. It is not certain, however, that the trouble with the treated hogs was hog cholera, as none died. All of the autopsies on the check animals showed typical lesions of hog cholera.

August, 1910 (South Omaha, Nebr.): Experiment. This experiment was undertaken at the request of State officials and the Nebraska Swine Breeders' Association. The Union Stock Yards Co., of South Omaha, also offered to cooperate and to bear the expense incident to the purchase and care of hogs used in the experiment. Thirty pigs, weighing from 40 to 60 pounds, were purchased from a farm which had been free from hog cholera for several years. These hogs were carried to the stockyards and, on July 23, 1910, four of them were injected with blood from hogs sick of hog cholera. These injected pigs, which were placed in a pen by themselves, became sick on the 28th of July, at which time 18 of the remaining pigs were given one dose of the serum, while the other 8 pigs were not treated in any way. The 18 serum-treated pigs and the 8 untreated pigs were then placed in the same pen with the 4 pigs which had been made sick of hog cholera. The four pigs which were inoculated with hog cholera all died. The eight untreated check pigs all contracted hog cholera from the four inoculated ones. The 18 pigs which were given serum and which were confined in the same pen with the 4 original sick pigs and with the 8 untreated pigs, which became sick, remained perfectly well and were finally turned over to the officials of the stockyards company upon the completion of the experiment on September 17, 1910.

In conclusion, the total number of hogs treated by both the serum-alone and the serum-simultaneous methods in the above demonstrations was 744, of which 613, or approximately 82 per cent, survived, while of the untreated hogs, which numbered 362, 228, or approximately 65 per cent, died. The figures given showing the percentage of the untreated animals which died are not absolutely correct in that in the case of two herds the report was to the effect that a large number of untreated hogs died, while in four herds it was reported that all untreated animals died. As we had no definite data as to the number of untreated animals in these herds, they were not considered in figuring the percentage.

NOTE.—In addition to the above-described demonstration experiments, a number of similar experiments have been carried out; but the records of these tests are not immediately available. If the committee desires, they will be secured and furnished later.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Before I commence to speak upon this amendment I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to the fact that his own State has only spent $2,500, according to the official statement upon page 29 of the hearings, in attempting to control hog cholera. While the States of the Union are spending $200,000 annually in combating hog cholera the great State of Iowa has spent only the amount of $2,500 during the past year. Now that is a fact, gentlemen——

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. GOOD. In making these appropriations is it the theory that the States are to expend the money for eradicating and preventing this disease?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I will come to that in a moment. I want to emphasize the fact that while other States of the Union are spending $200,000 that Iowa is only spending $2,500. Now, hog cholera comes under the class of diseases for which the United States Government has worked out a formula. This formula has been patented by Dr. Dorsett and given for the free use of our people. Serum is not claimed to be a cure of hog cholera but a preventive, and having worked out this formula, they have turned it over to the States of the Union and they have asked State authorities to apply it in each individual case. This is precisely what the National Government ought to do. The National Government having perfected what it claims to be an absolute preventive of hog cholera, the National Government called in all the experiment stations of the different States of the Union and gave public demonstration of how to produce the serum and how to apply it properly. They then gave this important work over to the different States of the Union. In taking this action the National Government has in a very proper way proceeded to the carrying of applied science to the agricultural sections of the United States. I am glad to see the new interest in this project, and I claim some credit for my committee that we have given through our hearings the information which has stimulated this activity on this floor to-day. The real ground for complaint is that the Department of Agriculture has never yet given sufficient public demonstrations to prove conclusively the fact that serum is a hog cholera preventive. That is the only question to be demonstrated. They have made only two public demonstrations, one involving the use of only 30 hogs and the other the use of only 35 hogs during these years since 1906. It is not sufficient proof to rest the reputation of this remedy on two public demonstrations using only 65 hogs. We have had this remedy since 1906, and the fact is that the loss by hog cholera has not diminished but has actually increased. Now this creates a legitimate field for valuable demonstration work; it is a call to the Agricultural Department to go out among the farmers and to the different States and demonstrate the efficacy of this remedy; to prove whether the States are or are not carrying out the work in the proper manner and whether the serum is or is not a reliable preventive. But that work can not possibly take $200,000. There is no question about that. To appropriate $200,000 for such a purpose would be a gross extravagance. I come from the fourth hog-growing State in the Union, and I am proud of it.

Indiana is the fourth greatest hog-growing State in the Union, but our farmers will condemn as gross extravagance the use of $200,000 to demonstrate the efficiency of hog serum. The amount of money we are spending to eradicate the cattle tick has nothing to do with this question. I hope to have something to say upon that later on. I understand that the Committee on Agriculture at the proper time is prepared to present an amendment appropriating $45,000 for demonstration work in cholera. According to the testimony in the hearings this will carry the work to four centers, or organize this work in four different States of the Union through the Department of Animay Industry to demonstrate the fact whether the hog cholera serum is a preventive or not, and when that amendment comes on the floor of the House I propose to support it. The States of the Union themselves are spending $200,000 per year at least to demonstrate the serum remedy. In Indiana our State experiment station manufactures hog-cholera serum and supplies it at cost to our farmers. I am proud of the fact that my State is one of the pioneers in this work, and while our experiment station is furnishing serum to the farmers of my State, in the great State of Iowa, according to the official statement, they are only expending $2,500 in this work, so I do not think it is fair for a representative of that State to insist that $200,000 be given to this work by the National Government. The great losses from hog cholera justify every effort to prove that these losses may be prevented and the very best methods of securing these results. The appropriation of $45,000 will secure these ends as surely as will the larger one of $200,000, and I trust that the committee will act in a conservative manner.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his statement, and it will cause me to make my remarks shorter than they otherwise would be. I want to say to the committee that this matter particularly was not presented to the committee until the bill was made up, and then some gentleman came in and presented this subject. I sent for Dr. Melvin and had a conversation with him touching the matter, and after consultation with him the committee agreed to offer the amendment referred to here, giving $45,000 for investigation along this line, furnishing the States with the information so that the States could do this work. And my colleague here was authorized to draw the amendment, and I ask him now to present the substitute——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman a question? Where does the gentleman propose to have this amendment introduced?

Mr. LAMB. Right here at the end of this paragraph.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How much does he propose?

Mr. LAMB. Forty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. To be devoted to what?

Mr. LAMB. To this serum work.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does he think that will be enough?

Mr. LAMB. That is what Dr. Melvin thinks, and Mr. Moss also agrees with me.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How many States would this demonstration reach?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Three centers, with four counties to a center.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the gentleman think that is enough?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Enough to determine whether it is safe, or whether we have agricultural experiments in every State in the Union, and the moment we can demonstrate the methods employed are sufficient, the States may take up the work.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman. I have just been reading the testimony before the gentleman's committee, and I judge from Dr. Melvin's statement that as a preventive this serum which is being developed is absolutely reliable. I think the gentleman will agree with me that that is his testimony.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. That is his testimony, but I will not agree that the testimony is correct. I do not believe it is reliable.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Dr. Melvin testified that it is absolutely reliable. There is one thing in that connection——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is a very reasonable one. It deals with a very important subject. If it is worth while to appropriate $325,000 to eradicate cattle tick in the Southern States, it ought to be worth while to appropriate $200,000 to eradicate hog cholera. The hog values of the Nation are almost equal to the cattle values.

I think the annual value of beef cattle raised in this country is about $790,000,000, while the average annual value of the hogs raised in the country is about $528,000,000. No dollar of public money has been expended in an attempt to eradicate hog cholera, and the time has come when the States of the Union ought to demand of the Federal Government some recognition of this great industry.

It has been said that no serum has yet been discovered which is efficacious in the eradication of hog cholera, but the testimony of men who are qualified to speak is to the effect that a serum has been discovered which is effective. Two hundred thousand dollars is not a large sum for so important an object.

Mr. LAMB. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that Dr. Melvin has stated that $45,000 will do.

Mr. MADDEN. If Dr. Melvin said that $45,000 is sufficient, why does Dr. Melvin and those connected with the Department of Agriculture think it is necessary to expend $325,000 for an object not more important than hog raising?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Does the gentleman mean $200,000 to eradicate hog cholera by a cure, or $200,000 to demonstrate the proper method of applying the serum? What does the gentleman mean by the expenditure of $200,000?

Mr. MADDEN. What I mean by the expenditure of $200,000 from the Federal Treasury is to use that money for every legitimate purpose, with the end in view of eradicating the hog cholera, and thereby enabling the men who are engaged in the industry of raising hogs to get the best possible percentage of hogs which can be grown and sold to the people of the United States.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Does the gentleman believe that with $200,000 the Department of Agriculture can go into all parts of the United States and make such a demonstration as the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. MADDEN. I believe the Agricultural Department of the United States should go into every part of the United States where it is necessary to go in order to demonstrate to the people who are engaged in the business of raising hogs how they can successfully raise them, and how hog cholera can be successfully eradicated.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. That is not the question that I asked of the gentleman. What I asked the gentleman was if he believed he could take $200,000 and do that work?

Mr. MADDEN. I think so; and after they have made the experiment and it is discovered that more than $200,000 is needed, then I think it will become the duty of the United States to make any further appropriation that may be needed to accomplish the object in view.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I believe with the gentleman there, but I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Is it not a fact that with $45,000 it will be demonstrated whether or not the serum is an effective preventive against hog cholera, just as certainly as it would be with an appropriation of $200,000?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not say that that will be so, because with an expenditure of $45,000 the department will be limited in its experiments to one or two or three experimental stations, and I believe that experiment stations should be established in every section of the country.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I know that the gentleman is thoroughly familiar with the testimony, because he was present at the hearings when the testimony was taken by the committee. Now, Dr. Melvin claimed that the appropriation should be made in multiples of $15,000, and therefore if $45,000 were appropriated they would have experiments going on at three different points. If $200,000 were appropriated, experiments could be conducted at 13 different points. The only difference between the $45,000 proposed and the $200,000 suggested by the gentleman would be the difference between conducting experiments at 3 stations and conducting them at 13 stations.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and experiments should be conducted within the territory embraced between the 13 stations.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. It will be the difference between 3 points and 13 points?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but there is no more reason why the experiments should be conducted at 3 points than there is that they should be conducted at 13 points. The fact is that every section of the Union is entitled to exactly the same treatment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think there is some misunderstanding as to the amount recommended by Dr. Melvin, and I therefore call attention to the testimony of Dr. Melvin before the committee of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] is chairman. Mr. SLOAN asked him this question:

> For the ensuing year, what reasonable amount of funds might prudently and effectively be used along the lines you suggest?
> Dr. MELVIN. Of course, in demonstration work of this character the committee would consider that estimates that we made might materially be decreased later, as when the methods were put into practical operation by States, and we would have to, in making any estimates, figure on the maximum expenses rather than on the minimum expenses, because we would not care to undertake an experiment of this sort without being able to put it through successfully. I think that in taking a block of counties of, say, four in a State, considering the maximum number of men that we would require and the maximum amount of serum that we would require, and all that, it would be an item of probably $15,000 for that block of counties.

Now the question is, How many blocks of counties would be needed in the experiment? The gentleman's suggestion of an amendment is based upon the idea that there should be only three experimental stations. Now, I have doubt about three being enough. This is a question involving the meat supply of the United States. In the last 10 years, according to information furnished by the last census and according to figures of the Agricultural Department, our population increased 21 per cent. Milch cows increased 20 per cent; beef and other cattle, if I have the figures correctly in mind, decreased 18 per cent; sheep decreased 14 per cent; and hogs decreased 7 per cent. There is nothing more devastating among farm animals than hog cholera. Therefore there is nothing of more material interest as involving the food supply of the country than this very question of hog cholera. So it seems to me we ought to consider very carefully the amount of the appropriation. I would not advocate an excessive appropriation, but I would advocate an appropriation that would be sufficient to put this serum into as many hands as possible for effective use.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. In the first place, take Dr. Melvin's testimony that the appropriation ought to be in multiples of $15,000.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The gentleman is also aware that the different States are also experimenting with the serum cure.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understand they are; but I understand that some of the serums put forth by the various States are not efficient. I get that from Dr. Melvin's testimony. Is not that the gentleman's understanding also?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I think the gentleman is mistaken. It is not the serum from the States, but some of this serum is also being manufactured by private parties and being sold, and it is that serum which is being manufactured from private sources that he says is inefficient. I do not understand that Dr. Melvin challenges any serum that is being put out from State sources.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It may be that the gentleman is right, but I understood that it was from State sources, and I understood that it was because of inefficient manufacture or production of the serum.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I think the gentleman is aware of the fact that in Indiana we have a station supported by the State, where they manufacture the serum under the formula of the National Government, and it is supplied to any farmer in the State at cost through a veterinarian. The experiment is going on in all parts of Indiana. The same thing is done in practically every hog State. The question is: Why are not the ravages of hog cholera being checked? And on the part of those people who originally brought this question to the attention of Congress the contention is that the National Government ought to go out on a campaign of education, taking this serum and making public demonstrations sufficient to prove to the people of the United States the proper method of its use.

Mr. HOBSON rose.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee may be heard on this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Can you not fix a time to close debate?

Mr. LAMB. If the Members of the House will turn to page 10, they will find that this $620,000 in a lump sum provides for the purchase in open market of samples of all tubercular serums and analogous products of foreign and domestic manufacture which are sold in the United States for the prevention, protection, treatment, and cure of diseases of domestic animals. In addition to that I have from Dr. Melvin in private conversation information as to the amount of money that will be necessary. I know nothing about the hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department, but I am surprised to find that the views of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] coincide so much with mine. I want to say to gentlemen that an amendment will be offered covering the whole thing and give you sufficient money to test these matters. You are not going into the States to tell the people what to do, as you do in the cattle-tick business. The States have to buy the serum after the Department of Agriculture ascertains what will destroy the cholera and do the work. I am informed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that the State of Illinois is now doing that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is the State doing?

Mr. FOSTER. The State of Illinois is furnishing a serum; they have established a laboratory.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. So has Michigan, but not efficiently nor effectively.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how much they furnish. Originally the National Government helped the State to establish a laboratory. For instance, they would have to have an old immune hog. I am informed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOSS] that the State of Illinois spends $22,500 in this work.

Mr. MANN. The State of Illinois raises more fat hogs and loses more by cholera than any other State in the Nation.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; the great trouble with Illinois has been in shipping hogs from some other State into our State.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The stockyards at Chicago make that record?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. You lose a great many hogs in the stockyards.

Mr. HOBSON rose.

Mr. LAMB. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama for a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized simply to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question, or am I recognized for five minutes?

Mr. LAMB. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is a question whether this work that is proposed to be done with the money carried by this amendment is available or not, or whether it should be available for more than simply demonstration purposes as to its present efficiency so as to cover further experimentation and develop greater efficiency, both for curative as well as for demonstration purposes.

Mr. LAMB. We propose to divert $45,000 especially for that work.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not believe we ought to be limited. If they need more money that money ought to be provided, so that the field covered should not simply be an ocular demonstration to the people of localities of the effectiveness of existing serum, but to the manufacture of serum, now in an experimental stage, and the Government can very properly encourage investigations as to that manufacture.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. It is in the experimental stage.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that since 1908 an almost perfect serum for the prevention of hog cholera has been in use by the Government. The testimony of Dr. Melvin is that he can not push out this serum so it will be of benefit to thousands of farmers who are losing hogs by cholera because of the insufficiency of the fund—that it would take a great deal of money. If the gentleman from Alabama would yield long enough I would like to read to gentlemen from Dr. Melvin's statement on how perfect that serum is.

Mr. HOBSON. I think I agree with the gentleman from Iowa, and that the great need of the whole Government is that its available information should be taken down to the people for actual practical use. But the fact remains that the question of serum has not passed beyond the experimental stage. If I did not go further I could quote many statements by gentlemen that in many cases the manufacture of this serum is not as perfect as could be wished. Take my own district. We have been calling on the Government to make a demonstration. Yesterday we had an appeal that cholera had sprung up in a peculiar way, and they wanted the Government to send down and test 300 hogs, and actually the United States Government did not have enough serum to inoculate 100 hogs, and they would have to go to Ames, Iowa, and see if perhaps they could not get them to work some kind of a manufacturing process to supply serum for 200 hogs for a special purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the committee understand the importance of this question. It is not alone in the interest of the farmers, but it is in the interest of the public at large, and especially the laboring man. I represent a district which is one of the largest producers of swine in this country. I have had some practical experience in raising these animals myself. Hogs are now quoted in the Chicago market at 8 to 9 cents a pound, live weight. I have no hesitation in saying, from actual experience, that if hog cholera could be stamped out hogs could be produced in Iowa so that they could and would be sold in the Chicago market for 4 to 5 cents a pound.

They could be produced there at a profit at the latter price if there was no cholera. We can not do anything more in this House to reduce the cost of living to the poor man than to give him what was formerly his cheap meat, and to do that we will have to make some substantial provision for stamping out all hog cholera. That is what we need here more than anything else to reduce the cost of living. I know, from experiments in my own district, that the Government serum has been fairly successful, but the only trouble has been, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has stated, that the Government did not have enough of it to use in any substantial quantity.

Mr. HOBSON. And until you can get a sufficient quantity you can not standardize the manufacture. It is now made in such an infinitesimal scale that it can not be made efficient and effective.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is absolutely correct. We have found also that the serum furnished by the State is not effective and has not been of advantage to the users.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. On what does the gentleman base his statement that the serum produced by the State is not effective?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Because people who are reliable have written me to that effect, and I believe their statements.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Then the gentleman is basing it on the statement of some one whose hogs were vaccinated with it and failed to escape from the ravages of cholera?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What better authority could I have?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I just wanted to know.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have taken it from actual experiments and workings of the use of the serum, and I have taken the effect of the Government serum from the same source. If this House wants to reduce the cost of living, it can do it in no more effective way than to give a liberal appropriation for the purpose of stamping out hog cholera.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, to show that the serum that has been manufactured by the Government is a little beyond the stages of experiment, I want to read from the testimony of Dr. Melvin, who says of one experiment:

> July, 1908, Kansas City experiment. Thirty-five young shoats were purchased from a farm where hog cholera had not existed. These pigs, having been carried to Kansas City stockyards and being in charge of a committee appointed by the exchange, were treated as follows: Twenty-two were injected with antihog-cholera serum prepared by the bureau; 4 were injected with virulent hog-cholera blood; 9 were not treated in any manner. All were placed in the pen together. As was expected, the 4 pigs inoculated by virulent blood contracted hog cholera within a short time and died. The 9 checks contracted hog cholera from those which were inoculated with hog-cholera blood, and they also died. The 22 pigs treated with the serum remained well, with the exception of 1 or 2 which were slightly affected on one or two days. It is not certain, however, that the trouble with the treated hogs was hog cholera, as none died.

Mr. Chairman, if that does not show that the serum manufactured by the Government is away beyond the stage of experiment, then I do not understand the English language.

Mr. HOBSON. The trouble is with the manufacture of it.

Mr. GOOD. The trouble has been with the manufacturers of patent medicines. They have never wanted the Government to manufacture serum that was worth anything. The manufacturers of worthless patent medicines have stood as a bar to giving to the people of this country an effective hog-cholera remedy.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, can not we have some agreement by unanimous consent with reference to the time that this debate shall run?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will try to do that presently.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the question which concerns the House the most at this time is not as to the number of hogs that die from cholera but what will we do with the serum, what is its merit? Will the serum when properly applied protect hogs from hog cholera? Will it cure, will it prevent hog cholera? Is it of practical value? And as to that I think it is safe and well for us to accept the statement of Dr. Melvin, who claims the credit of having discovered this serum. I will read from his letter of September 25, 1907, to the Secretary. He says:

> The result obtained shows quite clearly that a comparatively certain method of protecting hogs from hog cholera has been discovered.

In Bulletins Nos. 72 and 102 we find that extensive experiments have been made, with splendid results; in fact, all the bulletins and Government reports printed on the subject corroborated Dr. Melvin's statement that the serum is a comparatively certain method, not as a cure nor a certain preventative, but a comparatively certain method of preventing hogs from hog cholera. On the other hand, we find a number of people skeptical as to its practical value. I hold in my hand a clipping from an Iowa daily. The editorial therein comments on the Iowa State Legislature's dealing with the problem. It states that the State legislature is stumped and afraid to tackle the proposition. Its special Des Moines correspondent calls attention to a letter written by Park, Davis & Co., a company which I believe is, if not the largest, one of the largest manufacturers of drugs and medicines, reliable and, I believe, in high standing. The letter, purported to be written by the firm, states that the firm has for 20 years been experimenting on the subject of hog cholera and proper methods of treatment, and has investigated a great many proposed remedies for the control of this disease, but thus far it has not been sufficiently impressed with any product that it has investigated to warrant the firm's recommending it or putting it on the market. They add that they have spent considerable money in investigating this particular hog-cholera serum, and after so doing they come to the conclusion not to embark in the manufacture of this product, because it was altogether too uncertain in its action to warrant their doing so. They call attention to the National Live Stock Sanitary Association, which met in Chicago in December, including our own State veterinary, taking strong exception to the product; also to the fact that Canadian newspaper clippings, of recent date, go to show that the Canadian Government at Ottawa has become so skeptical regarding this serum that they have prohibited its being imported into Canadian territory.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. BOOHER. If the Government has discovered a formula for the prevention of hog cholera, what is there to prevent the Government authorities from making that known to the State and county authorities?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is exactly what the department did. The department claims that it has made a discovery which has merit, and others claim that it has no merit and that it is of no practical value. We have been trying to force this onto the States. The department maintains a station in our State within a mile of the gentleman's district, a few miles from his home. This station has been maintained at Government expense with a scientist in charge to demonstrate to the people of Iowa and the country that this discovery, the serum, is of value, not as a cure, but a preventative of hog cholera.

Mr. McKENZIE. How much money was expended last year for the purpose of eradicating hog cholera?

Mr. HAUGEN. In the State of Iowa?

Mr. McKENZIE. No; by the United States Agriculture Department.

Mr. HAUGEN. My understanding is that the department expended about $10,000 last year, besides the States appropriated large sums of money for the purpose of advancing the serum treatment, as, for instance—

Ohio appropriated	$40,000
Pennsylvania appropriated	25,000
Missouri appropriated	25,000
Illinois appropriated	22,500
Nebraska appropriated	15,000
Minnesota appropriated	6,000
Iowa appropriated	2,500

In all, more than 25 States have appropriated money for the purpose.

The department and the committee have been criticized for not expending more money. One gentleman says that the department does not keep enough serum on hand to supply the demand. Well, let us see about that. Congress appropriated $600,000 for the current year and the committee has recommended $620,000 for the coming year for the lump sum under consideration. If only $10,000 of that amount was used for providing the people with the serum and demonstrating the best method of preventing cholera, it is not the fault of Congress, as every dollar of the $600,000 was available for that one purpose, and I further submit that if the department used only $10,000 out of the $600,000 appropriation for this purpose, and if the department got all the money it asked for, then that is evidence that the $10,000 was all that it deemed necessary to expend, and that the department adhered to the plan suggested in its report and bulletin; that is, that after the department had made the discovery of the serum and had demonstrated its value the States should carry out the work.

Now, a word about lump-sum appropriation. In this bill, as in many other bills, we necessarily make lump-sum appropriation for a number of projects and leave it to the discretion and judgment of the department as to how and for what project or projects it is to be expended, as it is impossible for Congress to determine in advance the amount necessary for each project, for it can not foresee the emergencies that may arise. Furthermore, if appropriations are made for specific projects, the work of an employee whose salary is paid out of this one specific fund must be confined to that one project, and it is often necessary to send a number of men to the same place to carry on different and other lines of work, whereas one employee, if paid from the lump-sum appropriation, may work on a number of projects and thereby save expense to the Government. Hence it seems wise in many instances to appropriate lump sum for several items and leave it to the department to determine how and for what project or projects the money shall be expended. That is what we have in this case; and, Mr. Chairman, with a man at the head of the department who has alwys taken deep interest in matters of this kind, it seemed safe at the time the appropriation was made for Congress to trust to the judgment of the department to apportion the lump-sum appropriation between the projects; and considering it all, if Congress could not trust the department with apportioning that lump sum, what department could be trusted with apportioning lump sums appropriated? Now, this is quite different. A question has been raised as to the practical value of the serum, and the committee, after consideration, decided to recommend that the appropriation for the current year of $600,000 be increased to $620,000, with a proviso that not less than $45,000 should be set aside for demonstrating the best methods of preventing hog cholera.

If the amendment agreed to by the committee is adopted, then the department must set aside $45,000 for that purpose, and the $45,000 can not be used for any other purpose. If other amendments proposed to simply increase the lump-sum appropriations are adopted, the department is left to do as it pleases, whether it will use a dollar for the purpose or not, and in all probability it will use the same amount used heretofore. The purpose sought by the committee is to compel the department to demonstrate and settle the question whether the serum has any practical value or not. The committee thought that inasmuch as its merit had been questioned it is due that the department should demonstrate as to its practical value; and if, after it has been given a thorough trial and its value is determined, and if found of value Congress can then appropriate or turn it over to the State as suggested and as was done by the department. In short, first ascertain its value, then appropriate and apply the remedy. That is what an ordinary business man would do, and it seems to me that that would be the proper thing for Congress to do, and I trust that the proposed amendments to simply increase the lump-sum appropriation, without a proviso instructing the department in the matter, which may defeat the purpose sought by the committee, will not be agreed to.

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there is difference of opinion as to the practical value of the serum, for the benefit of those who may care to have the information given in the reports, bulletins, and clippings which I have referred to, and without expressing any opinion as to its merit, I send to the Clerk's desk bulletins, reports, and clippings referred to and ask that extracts of same be read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read in the gentleman's time.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield, but I would prefer to have this article read first.

Mr. GOOD. Who is the author of this article about to be read?

Mr. HAUGEN. It will explain itself.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to know——

Mr. HAUGEN. I say it is an editorial from a daily paper and from a special correspondent of this paper, and it will explain itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOG-CHOLERA CURE.

The Iowa Legislature, with the facilities within her borders for fighting hog cholera, seems to be stumped and afraid to tackle the proposition. * * *

Dr. W. B. Niles, of Ames, an animal-husbandry man working for the United States Government, is the scientist who has perfected the cure. Dr. Niles is not connected in any way with the State agricultural college. His work is entirely independent of the work of the State institution. His laboratory was established there because Ames was his home. The Ames College has made no effort toward working out a cure except to follow the directions of Dr. Niles.

The following from the Times special Des Moines correspondent says:

"A note of discord in the movement to have the State of Iowa go somewhat deeper into the manufacture of serum for the treatment of hog cholera appeared when Representative Grout, of Blackhawk, showed members a letter he has received on the subject that will be of very great interest to all stockmen. He had written the firm of Parke, Davis & Co., Detroit, to see if it would be possible to secure from a reputable firm of manufacturing pharmacists a supply of serum for use in Iowa in case it is not possible to get the right legislation for a State laboratory. In the reply this well-established firm said:

"'From your letter we judge that you have in mind the serum or sera recommended by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, Washington. We may state that we have for something over 20 years been experimenting on the subject of hog cholera and the proper method of treatment. We have investigated a great many proposed remedies for the control of this disease. Thus far we have not been sufficiently impressed with any product that we have investigated to warrant us in the belief that we could place it on the market with the assurance that it would be affording a sufficient measure of success, either as a prophylactic or curative agent, to warrant our doing so.

"'Referring specifically to the so-called "hog-cholera serum," after spending considerable money in investigating the question, we came to the conclusion about a year ago that we did not wish to embark in the manufacture of these products, chiefly because we felt they were altogether too uncertain in their action to warrant our doing so. We see no reason for changing our attitude at the present time. Particularly does this conclusion seem wise in view of the recent criticisms that have been offered against these products at the last meeting of the National Live Stock Sanitary Association, which met in Chicago in December. Your own State veterinarian, if we are not mistaken, took very strong exception to the products. We learn from a Canadian newspaper clipping of recent date that the Canadian Government at Ottawa has become so skeptical regarding the value of these serums that they have prohibited their being imported into Canadian territory.

"'To sum the matter up, we do not feel warranted in making any provision at this time for the manufacture of the so-called "hog-cholera serums," and do not anticipate placing them on the market. We regret very much that it is necessary for us to come to this conclusion, especially as we realize the great commercial possibilities of a successful agent for controlling hog cholera, but in view of our knowledge up to the present time and our own experience we are forced to the conclusion that we can not render sufficiently valuable service to the farming community to warrant our placing the products on the market.'

"This is taken by members not to mean that no good can come from the manufacture of the serums, but that great care should be taken in the matter, and, in fact, that there should be no administering of a serum except under the direction of a veterinarian. About all the success in heading off hog cholera in Iowa has come from the homemade medicine, while it is asserted that importation of stuff has been only to make matters worse."

THE CONTROL OF HOG CHOLERA BY SERUM IMMUNIZATION.

[By A. D. Melvin, D. V. S., Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.—Annual Report of the Bureau of Animal Industry, 1908.]

FACTS ON WHICH TREATMENT IS BASED.

As a result of experimental work conducted by the Biochemic Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry and recorded in Circular 43 and in Bulletin 72 of this bureau the conclusion was reached that the so-called hog-cholera bacillus is not the true cause of hog cholera, but that this organism plays the part of a secondary invader, the true cause of the disease being a virus which is present in the blood of hogs affected with hog cholera, and which, under certain conditions of filtration, is capable of passing through the finest porcelain filters. Up to the present time this filterable virus has resisted all attempts at artificial cultivation, and we know of its presence only through the effect upon hogs when fluids from sick animals, free from all known bacteria, are injected into susceptible animals. It is a well-known fact that hogs which have recovered from an attack of hog cholera are completely immune when subsequently exposed to the same disease.

These two facts—the presence of the filterable virus in the blood of hogs sick of hog cholera and the immunity in hogs which have recovered from an attack of that disease—form the basis for the preparation of the serum which we have used successfully in immunizing hogs against cholera.

METHOD OF SECURING IMMUNE SERUM.

Without attempting to go into the method of producing this serum in detail, it will be sufficient to say that the protective serum is produced by a process of hyperimmunization carried out as follows:

An immune hog is injected with large amounts of blood from hogs sick of hog cholera. These injections will not produce more than a transitory effect upon the health of the immune, although they would prove certainly fatal to a susceptible hog. This treatment of immune hogs with large amounts of virulent blood is known as hyperimmunization, and gives to the blood of the immune the power to protect susceptible hogs from hog cholera. After a week or so, when the immune has recovered from the effects of this treatment, blood is drawn from that animal by cutting off the end of the tail. The blood drawing is repeated three or four times at intervals of a week, after which the immune is usually bled to death from the carotid artery. After each drawing from the immune the blood obtained is defibrinated and mixed with a suitable antiseptic. If preserved in sterile bottles, this defibrinated blood, or serum, as it is called, will retain its potency for years.

The protective serum having been obtained from an immune hog in the manner indicated, the potency of this serum is determined by injecting susceptible pigs with varying amounts, and at the same time exposing them to hog cholera along with untreated control animals. In practice it will, of course, be found best first to collect large quantities of serum and to mix this before testing. A standard serum will thus be secured at a minimum cost.

METHOD OF PROTECTING SUSCEPTIBLE HOGS.

A standard serum of known potency having been secured, either of two methods may be used for protecting susceptible pigs. These are known as (1) the "simultaneous" method and (2) the "serum-alone" method, or simply the serum method.

The first of these, which is to be recommended for use especially in herds which have not been exposed to hog cholera, consists in injecting subcutaneously on one side of the body of the pig to be vaccinated a suitable quantity of serum, and simultaneously on the other side of the body a small quantity of virulent blood taken from a hog sick of hog cholera. Experiments have shown that by this method pigs are given a firm immunity, lasting at least six months and probably longer.

The serum-alone method, which consists simply in the injection of the protective serum without the simultaneous use of virulent blood, appears to confer only a temporary immunity upon the treated pigs, unless they are exposed to hog cholera a short time after receiving the serum, in which case they also acquire a lasting immunity. For these reasons this method is admirably adapted to the treatment of hogs in a herd where hog cholera has already broken out but which have not themselves shown visible symptoms of disease.

The experiments which are being carried out to determine the curative properties of the serum are not yet complete, but from the results thus far obtained we know that serum in the doses used for immunization can not be depended upon to cure hogs which already show visible symptoms of hog cholera. Further work along this line is needed. Neither the simultaneous nor the serum-alone method, when properly applied, appears to injure the hog in any way.

COST OF THE SERUM.

In order to determine the cost of producing serum for practical use every item of cost would, of course, have to be taken into account and alowance made for all sources of revenue. Owing to the conditions under which the work of the bureau has been carried on—that is, manufacturing serum for experimental use only and utilizing the same force for the production of the serum and for carrying on varied experiments—it is impossible to determine the exact cost of the serum thus far produced. Sufficient work has been done, however, for an estimate to be made. With the dose of serum at 20 cubic centimeters and with the production carried out with strict economy, it seems likely that the cost per dose can be brought within 25 cents. This estimate is based upon the supposition that each hyperimmunized immune will furnish 150 to 200 doses of serum, and that the carcass of the immune after final bleeding will be utilized for food. There seems to be no objection to the use of such a carcass for food purposes, provided the post-mortem examination discloses no reason for rejecting it.

* * * * * * *

RESULTS OF PRACTICAL TESTS OF THE SERUM.

The statements made above concerning the protective power of serum from hyperimmunized immunes are based upon tests on several thousand hogs. These tests were carried out not only in small experiment pens, but in great part upon farms under practical conditions. During the fall of 1907 approximately 2,000 hogs were treated on 50 different farms, a considerable proportion of untreated hogs being left in all cases as a control on the action of the serum. Both methods of treatment were used, and the herd conditions varied widely. * * *

* * * In the herds where hog cholera appeared subsequent to treatment practically all of the treated hogs remained well, while more than 65 per cent of the checks died. In the herds which had been exposed but were apparently well at the time of treatment 4 per cent of the treated animals died, while approximately 90 per cent of the checks succumbed. In the herds where disease existed at the time of treatment, and where very great success was not expected, 13 per cent of the treated animals were lost, whereas 75 per cent of the checks died.

These successful field trials, confirming as they do numerous tests carried out under experimental conditions, have convinced us of the efficiency of this method of dealing with hog cholera, and although improvements will undoubtedly be made in many of the details of producing the serum, the method is believed to be now in such condition as to make the practical use of it entirely feasible.

CONFERENCES OF FEDERAL AND STATE REPRESENTATIVES.

In order that the States most concerned in this subject might be brought into closer relation with the work, and also for the purpose of discussing plans for effective coordination of State and Federal work in dealing with hog cholera, 25 of the chief hog-raising States were requested to send representatives to Ames, Iowa, where the Bureau of Animal Industry maintains a farm devoted to experiments with hog cholera. In response to this invitation representatives from 20 different States visited Ames and were shown the details of the serum production.

A general discussion at these conferences developed the practically unanimous opinion on the part of State and Federal representatives that the serum should be prepared by each of the States for distribution to the hog raisers, and all State representatives expressed their intention to undertake the work as soon as funds could be secured. At the present time a number of States have actually begun work. If the serum is prepared in sufficient quantities there seems to be no doubt that a great saving can be effected simply by treating animals in exposed herds or in herds in which the disease has just appeared.

A PLAN FOR CONTROLLING AND ERADICATING HOG CHOLERA BY SERUM IMMUNIZATION.

* * * * * * *

It has already been stated that the serum from hyperimmunized hogs can be used to protect hogs from hog cholera and that a large saving can be effected if the serum is applied promptly after the disease appears in a herd. Why, then, should not this serum be used as an agent for the eradication of hog cholera? It seems reasonable to believe that it can be used successfully for this purpose, but complete success can not be expected without proper organization and the direction of the work by health authorites.

In order that the possibilities of well-directed work along these lines may be brought to the attention of those who may in the future have this work to perform, the following plan for combating hog cholera through serum immunization is submitted:

1. The serum should be prepared by the State experiment stations or by State live-stock sanitary boards which are properly equipped with laboratory facilities, the efficacy of all serum to be determined by such laboratories before distribution.

2. The field application of the serum should be in the hands of the State live-stock sanitary board or State veterinarian.

3. The State should be organized into districts, each in charge of a deputy State veterinarian or a deputy appointed by the live-stock sanitary board. These districts should be small enough to permit the deputy to exercise close watch over them.

4. The deputy State veterinarian should keep a supply of serum on hand, so that prompt action may be taken when infection appears.

5. Hog raisers generally throughout the State should be informed when the serum is available for distribution, and if necessary compulsory notification of the presence of disease in a herd should be imposed.

6. Upon notification to the State live-stock sanitary board or State veterinarian that hog cholera has appeared in a certain neighborhood, the diseased herd or herds should be immediately quarantined, the premises disinfected as thoroughly as possible, and all hogs on the farm which have been exposed or which are not visibly ill should be treated with serum alone. All hogs on the farm which have not been exposed should be treated by the simultaneous method, and of course the prompt removal of dead animals should be enforced. At the same time all hogs on surrounding farms should be treated by the simultaneous method.

Prompt action of this kind should result in confining the disease to the first herd where disease appeared, though we must admit the possibility of infection being carried beyond the vaccinated belt by birds. If this should occur, the procedure should be the same as in the first case of disease, though the probability of dissemination by birds will not be great, owing to the comparatively small size of the infected area.

With a well-organized live-stock sanitary board and an efficient corps of deputies throughout the State, there seems to be no reason why hog cholera should not be kept well under control and perhaps in time eradicated by proceeding in the way indicated. By starting the work in early spring or summer the task would probably be much simplified and the cost reduced to a minimum.

Aside from the eradication of hog cholera, it seems that an important saving to swine breeders and to the hog industry in general can be accomplished through the protective inoculation of pure-bred hogs. Some of these hogs represent years of patient effort on the part of breeders, and their loss is a loss to the swine industry in general, which depends for its success in great measure upon the development and preservation of the superior characters possessed by these pure-bred animals.

There is no doubt that the hog raisers would gladly cooperate with the State authorities and that as a rule any outbreak of disease would be promptly reported, as the farmer would have everything to gain and nothing to lose by so doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. May I have another minute?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments relating thereto be closed in 20 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for some little time on this. I would like that it be made 30 minutes so that I can have some time. I have made a careful study of this matter, and the bill was introduced by myself over a year ago after careful study of what the Government had been doing and what the governments of the different States had been doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman is out of order——

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would like to change my motion to 30 minutes. That will give full time for the gentleman to discuss this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia now moves that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be in the attitude of objecting to closing this debate, but I think——

Mr. LAMB. We desire to put this bill through here and we rarely give on any one paragraph as much time as this. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I was discussing the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. But the motion is not debatable. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, as follows: "At the end of line 12 strike out the semicolon and insert a colon, and add the following: 'Provided, That of this sum not less than $45,000 shall be set aside for demonstrating the best method of preventing hog cholera.'"

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, this is a committee amendment. When the committee acted upon this bill we did not have available information that we now have upon this subject. After making some investigation we find that there is considerable loss due to hog cholera. About 90 per cent of the loss of hogs is due to this disease. It creates the greatest ravage among farm animals of any disease known to farm animals except the cattle tick. At this time there seems to be something like, according to the report of the Bureau of Statistics, $18,000,000 a year loss due to hog cholera. Now, this is a direct loss to the producer and to the farmer and it is also an indirect loss to the consumer and to the whole country. The officials of the department were brought before some of the committees of the House to find out what investigation they had made.

For some years back the department made some investigations for a curative remedy, but after some progress the experts dropped that and looked for some preventive. In 1906 they secured what they thought was a preventive in the nature of a serum that would, when applied, prevent more than 90 per cent of all cases. That is the evidence of the department itself, furnished to the committee.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. If the department has discovered this remedy and knows it will prevent from 90 to 95 per cent of the loss, why does not the department make it known in the form of a bulletin so that it can be used? That is a thing I do not understand in this connection.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. The department has attempted from time to time to bring this information to the public and to the several States, and information has been brought to the several States, but there seems to be some lack of confidence of the public in the belief that this serum will act as a preventive.

Mr. BOOHER. If the public has no confidence in it, why appropriate a large sum of money to get them to have confidence in it? How are you going to do it that way?

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. The effort here is to bring this information to the public by way of demonstration. Now, this information has been sent out to organizations, and to some extent through the men of the department, but there has been very little demonstration concerning it.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman think we ought to pursue this as we have the cattle tick, and appropriate more and more every year for it? After you find the remedy, why not let the people use it?

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. That is the intention, but we want this remedy brought to the public by way of effective demonstration by the department.

Mr. MANN. What could you take this $45,000 away from in the bill? You brought in $620,000 for things that are already enumerated. Now you propose to take $45,000 away from that. What can you take it away from?

Mr. LAMB. Read the tenth page——

Mr. MANN. I have read the bill. Which do you do, admit that your bill was $45,000 too much or that you are going to take away $45,000 from something that needs it?

Mr. LAMB. We do not admit it is too much; but we made estimates according to the Secretary's suggestion. And when we asked Dr. Melvin if he could use some of this money in the serum matter and in the investigations, he said he could. That is all I knew about it.

Mr. MANN. But our friend from Nebraska [Mr. MAGUIRE] said the amount in the bill was not intended to cover this when you made that report—$620,000. If you diverted $45,000 from that, was the $620,000 too much when you brought it in, or are you going to take it from something else; and if so, what?

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. There is some $9,000 carried on last year's bill for hog cholera.

Mr. MANN. That leaves $36,000.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. All that we are attempting to do here is, that the department has used its judgment in distributing this lump sum——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands I am not criticizing the committee about it.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. All that we insist on now is that the Bureau of Animal Industry set aside not less than a certain specific amount for this work. He realizes that the testimony shows that it is necessary. He goes even further in his testimony here, and I will read a part of it——

Mr. MANN. What else can lose it? That is what I am trying to get at. What will you take it from? The gentleman does not desire to cripple some other service?

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. Perhaps some of this other work may be finished.

Mr. MANN. You propose an appropriation of $620,000, which was an increase of $20,000 without including this $40,000 item, and I assumed you knew what you were doing. What will you take that from without crippling the service?

Mr. LAMB. I asked Dr. Melvin if he could take care of this serum for hog cholera, provided we authorized him to do so in the bill, and he replied that he could.

Mr. MANN. That is an admission that you do not know what you can take it from without crippling the service.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, last August I introduced a bill to appropriate a hundred thousand dollars for this purpose. I did not do that until I had learned what the different States had done. I find there is error in the statement to-day made of what the different States have done in this way. The sums appropriated by the States amount to over $200,000. A list of the appropriations I shall submit for the RECORD. I did not ask it until I consulted with Dr. Melvin, the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and Dr. Dorset, the man who discovered this serum, and they stated and put the reputation of their bureau and division behind the proposition, that they had found not a cure, but had found a preventive remedy. And the illustration they used was that it was as efficacious as was the treatment they were giving in cooperation with the various States and individuals in exterminating the southern cattle tick.

Now, I do not refer to the southern cattle tick by way of invidious comparison. I only want to state that the department has said, including Secretary Wilson, Dr. Melvin, and Dr. Dorset, that they have an efficacious and effective remedy in the form of a preventive. I want to state this fact, too, that it is not a sectional request, because in the 10 States of this Union where the cattle tick is prevalent and where this $325,000 is to be expended, 20 per cent of the value of the hogs of this country now exists. Over $98,000,000 worth of hogs is in the 10 States, so that it is not sectional in any respect.

I asked for $100,000 at that time, because the States had already appropriated $200,000. The committee graciously granted $45,000. I am not discussing the matter of values. But we have this serum, and we know this is true, that although it has been known since 1906—inasmuch as in that year it was patented, and patented in the interest of the American people—it has not been brought home to those who need it.

Now, I shall submit as a part of my remarks a record showing in part what the department has done by way of testing this remedy. There are numerous tests that have been made. Most of them have been conducted on farms, much as the cattle-tick tests have been made, and in every case, or nearly every case, the evidence seems clear that a beneficent effect followed the application of the serum. Especially was it true in the two large tests, one made at Omaha and the other made at Kansas City.

I shall not undertake, as I have not the time, to state fully in regard to it, but I shall invite attention to a reading of the results of this test. Here seems to be the large trouble about this remedy: It is being manufactured by various concerns. It is a vital remedy, a remedy that involves the use not only of hogs that have become immune through having had the disease and recovered, but it involves also the purchase of other hogs that must be rendered immune before the serum can be produced to any large extent.

Now, this remedy can be carried by the department to the various sections of this country, and the public has a great deal more confidence in that which the Government stands behind than in that which any individual manufacturer or any State will produce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would like just one minute in which to answer more directly the question of the gentleman from Illinois. In apportioning this sum I notice that for the control and eradication of animal diseases they propose $620,000. Now, we propose in this amendment to devote 7½ per cent of that to this purpose.

Mr. SLOAN. I did not understand, Mr. Chairman, that my time had expired. I want to make a statement about the loss by the cattle tick.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask two minutes in which to make my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. In these "piping times of peace," when the economies of the Nation relate most largely to raiment and food for the present and reasonable assurance for the future, the Department of Agriculture easily commands and is entitled to a larger share of the public's interest than does any other department.

Of the two great bureaus relating to production in this department that of Animal Industry perhaps is more interesting than that of Plant Industry. One large reason for this is that the development of animal industry along proper lines is the strong guaranty that our soils may not be exhausted and the production of profitable plant life thereby become reduced and difficult.

The Department of Agriculture in 1910 issued a number of maps graphically locating in the various States classes of domestic animals used for food—cattle (other than milch cows), sheep, swine.

It will be noted that of that portion of the United States, North and South, thickly populated, and where game has ceased to be a large food factor, swine is the most uniformly distributed of the various food-producing animals.

The estimated values of these three classes for 1912 was—

Cattle, other than milch cows	$790,064,000
Swine	528,328,000
Sheep	181,170,000

When we recall the fact that this capital in hogs is turned about twice, while turned but once in cattle, and, further, when we remember that most landholders, large and limited, produce swine for home consumption and the market, and since swine products are served on more tables and on an average greater number of meals at each table than any other meat, not only in America, but in the world, the relative importance of our swine will become apparent.

Further, the readiness and steadiness of market for swine products, stretching back through a number of decades, with increasing readiness and steadiness at present, further emphasizes the importance of this branch of our animal industry.

While tick, mange, scabies, fever, black leg, and foot and mouth diseases have attacked and afflicted the cud-chewing domestic animals for the last 50 years, and thus worried the consumer and veterinary alike, there has been practically but one serious disease attacking our swine, and that is the so-called hog cholera.

It is estimated that through a long stretch of years, 5 per cent of our swine die of natural causes. Of that 5 per cent, 90 per cent die of cholera. This estimate is too low. A record of all the States for the last 27 years show the average loss from diseases of hogs in the United States has been 7.4 per cent, 90 per cent of which would be about 6.6 per cent, which would represent the deaths caused by cholera. The following, Table A, submitted by the Bureau of Animal Industry, shows the result of hog cholera for a 10-year period, beginning with 1903 and ending with 1912:

A.—Hogs and hog cholera, 10-year period, 1903–1912.

Average annual number of hogs in United States	53,700,000
Average total losses by disease—per cent	5.1

Average annual loss by hog cholera—number	2,417,000
Average annual farm value per hog	$7.36
Average total loss from hog cholera	$17,789,120

The following, Table B, shows an estimate for the various States of numerical and financial loss from hog cholera in the several States for the year ending March 31, 1912.

Estimated 90 per cent of loss due to hog cholera.

This loss would equal a very liberal income on the capital invested.

It was but to be expected that our great Secretary of Agriculture, who is now rounding his career of 16 years' continuous service in the presidential Cabinets of three Presidents, thus surpassing the record of all the Americans, should early and persistently direct the scientific experts of his department toward discovery of a cure for this disease, or a preventive remedy, which, if it would not cure, would check its spread.

The investigation of the scientists in the Department of Agriculture extended for a number of years toward finding a cure. In this the department was not and does not claim to have been successful. The testimony of Dr. Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and of Dr. Dorset, head of the Biochemic Division of that bureau, before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture developed the following facts: Along the line of investigation and experiment, beginning 1903, a serum was sought which would serve as a preventive of hog cholera, and under the direction of Dr. Dorset, in 1905, was produced and administered by the department as an effective preventive. It is the theory of the scientists—

That the disease is caused by an invisible organism that is so small that it passes through the finest porcelain filters and is not discernible with microscopes of the highest power. The method, generally speaking, of production is to take the hog which has recovered from the cholera, or is for any other cause immune, and inoculate it with a sufficient amount of blood taken from a sick hog. The effect of that injection is to heighten the immunity of the immune so that its blood will contain protective substances in such amount that comparatively small portions of this treated immune serum will protect the treated hogs from cholera.

It is confidently asserted by not only the discoverer of this preventive remedy, but by the head of the bureau and the Secretary himself, that as a preventive the serum is absolutely effective.

It was resonably considered that this preventive remedy being discovered, the process made known free to the American people, would prompt its early general production and application, but individuals, content with no attack being made upon their herds, looked to the States and the States looked to the General Government to advance its use until the ravages of the cholera, which moves in cycles and sections, comes home to the herd owner, and then it is too late to go through the process of production and application, each of which requires knowledge, skill, and care. The result, therefore, has been that although this discovery was complete in 1905, the campaign against hog cholera has not become general and effective enough even to stay the general high rate of mortality among hogs, but the losses have actually increased, so that the estimated loss for 1912 was $42,000,000.

The magnitude of this loss appears in the figures, but it must be understood that it does not fall entirely upon the swine owner. The loss ultimately falls not only upon the producer, but upon the consumer; and then, of course, the larger question of health to the consumer, while sometimes appearing only in the background, should challenge consideration.

Of the three great diseases attacking our meat-producing animals, hog cholera, southern cattle tick, and tuberculosis, probably rank in the order named.

The actual annual loss through death from cholera is estimated from eighteen to forty million dollars. The estimated loss for the cattle tick from four to eight million. I can not state definite satisfactory figures of the loss by tuberculosis. Of course the loss or damage arising out of lack of growth, deterioration of meats, hides, and so forth, would increase these figures in each class, more particularly perhaps in the second.

The work of aiding the meat producers of the country is well under way in those States where the southern cattle tick is prevalent. The department has cleared a large territory, which if grouped, would equal the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. This is done by the Government's first discovery of a remedy; and, second, through cooperating with the States, and individuals, bringing home the demonstrations of the process to the small producer as well as large producer, so that it once being demonstrated in a community, its efficacy shown, the individuals are encouraged to use the process to their own advantage and to the ultimate advantage of the general consumers. The committee has, in a limited way, recommended this general method toward eradication of the hog cholera. The different States have collectively appropriated something over $200,000 for the production of serum and a demonstration of its manner of application.

A great deal of good can be accomplished by the Government making demonstrations throughout the different sections of the country of the efficacy of its process. If its preventive remedy is what the department claims for it, it would be money well spent to encourage and stimulate its use through every State in the Union. If it is not effective, then it should be known and the department should continue its efforts toward discovering other methods of treatment.

The department has made a number of semiprivate demonstrations and two notable public demonstrations of the manner of application with the serum treatment. I submit a part of the evidence given by Dr. Melvin, found on pages 16, 17, and 18 of his testimony before the Committee on Expenditures. The Kansas City and Omaha experiments, of course, were the most representative and hence most conclusive.

The statement is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Please furnish specific incidents of those six years where you have sent the agents of your department to centers of hog-cholera infection and demonstrated your work.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1913.

PARTIAL SUMMARY OF RESULTS OBTAINED FROM APPLICATION OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY'S ANTICHOLERA SERUM.

[All animals were kept under ordinary farm conditions.]

October 19, 1908 (Michigan): Infected herd. When visited 1 hog had died, 7 were sick, and 21 apparently well. Treated, 23 (3 of which were sick). Untreated, 5.

Results: Treated, survived, 22, or approximately 96 per cent; untreated, survived, none.

October 20, 1908 (Michigan): Herd slightly infected. Treated, 11; untreated, 4.

Results: Treated, all remained well; untreated, all died.

July 15, 1909 (Maryland): Experiment. Owner had lost nearly all of his herd. He bought 11 pigs and agreed to have some of these treated by the serum simultaneous method and others inoculated with virus alone to serve as checks. Treated, 7; virus alone, 3.

Results: All treated animals remained well; all virus-alone animals died.

August 25, 1909 (Virginia): Data incomplete on account of remoteness of the herd, but reported that all treated animals remained well, while all untreated ones died.

September 15, 1909 (Virginia): Data incomplete. All treated animals remained well; all untreated animals died.

December 6, 1909 (Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station): Herd infected. Treated, 43, many of which were sick; untreated, none.

Results: Survived, 29, or approximately 68 per cent; died, 14, or approximately 32 per cent.

December 21–22, 1909 (Virginia): Herd very badly infected. About 35 animals had died, and practically all of the survivors were showing symtoms of hog cholera to a greater or less degree. Treated, 113, many of which were sick; untreated, 179.

Results: Treated, survived, 79, or approximately 69.91 per cent; treated, died, 34, or approximately 30 per cent; untreated, survived, 111, or approximately 62 per cent; untreated, died, 68, or approximately 38 per cent.

These data are incomplete, as at last report some of the untreated animals were said to have been "looking badly."

February 18, 1910 (West Virginia Hospital for Insane): Herd infected. Treated, 47, many of which showed early symptoms of disease; untreated, 52.

Results: Treated, survived, 36, or approximately 76 per cent; treated, died, 11, or approximately 24 per cent; untreated, died, 52, or 100 per cent.

April 16, 1910 (Maryland): Disease just beginning. Treated, 34; untreated, 16.

Results: Final report stated that all treated animals remained well. No mention was made as to the untreated ones.

April 16, 1910 (second herd, Maryland): Data incomplete; no detailed final report. Only the general statement received that all treated animals remained well.

July 9, 1910 (Iowa): Owner had lost the greater portion of his herd and had procured 14 pigs from one of his neighbors for this experiment. The simultaneous method was employed. Treated by, 11; virus alone, 3.

Results: Treated, survived, 8, or approximately 73 per cent; treated, died, 3, or approximately 27 per cent. All virus-alone animals died.

July 21, 1910 (Nebraska): Infected herd. Data incomplete. The final report was to the effect that nearly all treated animals survived. No statement as to the untreated ones.

November 12, 1910 (Washington, D. C., Jail): Herd badly infected. Treated, 18; untreated, exact number not known.

Results: Treated, survived, 14, or approximately 78 per cent; treated, died, 4, or approximately 22 per cent; untreated, no exact data. Received only the statement that all untreated animals died.

Results: Treated, survived, 73, or approximately 90 per cent; treated, died, 9, or approximately 10 per cent.

(The report on the untreated hogs is incomplete, but as near as could be determined 73 per cent died and 27 per cent survived.)

March 3, 1911 (Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station): Herd slightly infected. Treated, 42, 3 of which showed the early symptoms of hog cholera; untreated, 0.

July, 1908 (Kansas City, Kans.): Experiment. Thirty-five young shoats were purchased from a farm where hog cholera had not existed. These pigs, having been carried to the Kansas City stockyards and being in charge of a committee appointed by the exchange, were treated as follows: Twenty-two were injected with antihog-cholera serum prepared by the bureau. Four were injected with virulent hog-cholera blood. Nine were not treated in any manner. All were placed in a pen together. As was expected, the 4 pigs inoculated with the virulent blood contracted hog cholera within a short time and all died. The 9 "checks" contracted hog cholera from those which were inoculated with hog-cholera blood, and they also died. The 22 pigs treated with the serum remained well with the exception of one or two, which were slightly affected on one or two days. It is not certain, however, that the trouble with the treated hogs was hog cholera, as none died. All of the autopsies on the check animals showed typical lesions of hog cholera.

August, 1910 (South Omaha, Nebr.): Experiment. This experiment was undertaken at the request of State officials and the Nebraska Swine Breeders' Association. The Union Stock Yards Co., of South Omaha, also offered to cooperate and to bear the expense incident to the purchase and care of hogs used in the experiment. Thirty pigs, weighing from 40 to 60 pounds, were purchased from a farm which had been free from hog cholera for several years. These hogs were carried to the stockyards and, on July 23, 1910, 4 of them were injected with blood from hogs sick of hog cholera. These injected pigs, which were placed in a pen by themselves, became sick on the 28th of July, at which time 18 of the remaining pigs were given one dose of the serum, while the other 8 pigs were not treated in any way. The 18 serum-treated pigs and the 8 untreated pigs were then placed in the same pen with the 4 pigs which had been made sick of hog cholera. The 4 pigs which were inoculated with hog cholera all died. The 8 untreated check pigs all contracted hog cholera from the 4 inoculated ones. The 18 pigs which were given serum and which were confined in the same pen with the 4 original sick pigs and with the 8 untreated pigs, which became sick, remained perfectly well and were finally turned over to the officials of the stockyards company upon the completion of the experiment on September 17, 1910.

In conclusion, the total number of hogs treated by both the serum-alone and the serum-simultaneous methods in the above demonstrations was 744, of which 613, or approximately 82 per cent, survived, while of the untreated hogs, which numbered 362, 228, or approximately 65 per cent, died. The figures given showing the percentage of the untreated animals which died are not absolutely correct in that in the case of two herds the report was to the effect that a large number of untreated hogs died, while in four herds it was reported that all untreated animals died. As we had no definite data as to the number of untreated animals in these herds, they were not considered in figuring the percentage.

Mr. SLOAN. The various States have appropriated for the purpose of advancing the serum treatment as follows:

Ohio	$40,000
Pennsylvania	25,000
Missouri	25,000
Illinois	22,500
Nebraska	15,000
Kentucky	$10,000 to 15,000
California	8,000
Minnesota	6,000
Georgia	5,000
Maryland	5,000
Mississippi	5,000
Oklahoma	3,750
North Dakota	3,000
Kansas	3,000
Virginia	3,000
Iowa	2,500
Arkansas	2,000
Michigan	1,500
North Carolina	1,500
South Carolina	1,500
Wisconsin	600

The following States have either very small or indefinite funds provided: Delaware, Indiana, New York, South Dakota, and Louisiana.

I believe that any reasonable sum appropriated and prudently spent by the Government in forwarding this work will be returned to the people of the country, who are paying very high prices for their meats many hundredfold.

If even a fair measure of success should follow the extended use of this serum or other treatment that the department may find efficacious, there would be practical encouragement given to the States and individuals for the passage and enforcement of reasonable quarantine measures looking toward the more effective check of this disease between localities where the hog raiser is careful and enterprising and those communities where the owners are indifferent and shortsighted. It is known that the cholera is easily spread from one animal to another and readily carried from one community to another. The lack of known remedy or preventive, and the disastrous results following the infection of a herd, have heretofore prompted the swine owner at the first outbreak of the disease to hasten to market those apparently not infected or least infected. In that way, in the passing from farm to shipping point and being shipped in the various stock cars through the State and into other States, establishes highways for the carriage of this disease to every slaughtering point or yards where stock hogs may be purchased and distributed.

Dr. Melvin says:

In many outbreaks of cholera the disease is subacute, and in this form an owner could ship his apparently well hogs from some Western State to a live-stock center, such as Chicago, and without the disease having been developed sufficiently at the time of their arrival at Chicago to cause suspicion. These hogs might then be bought, and frequently are bought, for shipment to eastern markets, such as Buffalo, New York, or points in Massachusetts. Under the provisions of the 28-hour law these hogs would either have to be fed, watered, and rested in the cars or unloaded in stockyards en route for feed, water, and rest. In the latter case, we would be very apt to have several centers of infection established at these unloading yards between Chicago and this eastern point. Following this, it would be quite a common matter for some farmer or stock raiser in one of these intermediate States to bring in some stock hogs, unload them in these infected pens, and distribute them among his neighbors, and thus have a number of centers of infection established. This same thing would apply to hogs which might be shipped out of a State through one of these infected railroad yards. On account of the prevalence of cholera the department does not now permit the shipping out from any of the large stockyard centers of hogs for breeding or feeding purposes, because these yards are considered as being constantly infected with cholera.

Perhaps half of our swine for slaughter are carried into interstate commerce. Cooperation in quarantining with the best results should be between the States and the Government. With the large losses confronting the producers in every State, quarantine regulations for swine shipped for slaughter have been absolutely nil or, at least, not strict. There is a decided lack of uniformity. To show this lack of uniformity, speaking roundly, the States may be placed in the following classification:

First. Those that have some general quarantining provisions.

Second. Those whose quarantine provisions of law apply only to shipments of hogs for exhibition or breeding purposes, or both.

Third. States having no quarantine regulations for hogs.

There are in the first class: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Utah, Wyoming.

In the second class: Indiana, Montana, Nebraska, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Washington.

In the third class: Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Massachusetts, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Rhode Island, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

The production of meat for America and the world has been an important problem. To produce it at a reasonable price for the United States alone seems the future problem. The Department of Agriculture, disposing of this problem which we have discussed, has one of the most important problems of meat-food supply. Fortunately this does not relate to any particular locality or section of the United States. While some States are materially in advance of the others, yet there is no assurance that they will remain so long. A recent visit to the South, and an attendance at the National Corn Show at Columbia, S. C., where hundreds of boys were who had been raising from 100 to 200 or more bushels of corn per acre in the various States—Jerry Moore, South Carolina, 228¾ bushels, at cost of 16½ cents per bushel; James A. Leach, 196¼ bushels, at cost of 10 cents per bushel. This brought home the reflection that, with the increased yield of corn and other cereals in that great and fertile section, the enterprising citizens would be meeting the next important problem after production; that is, transportation. Wise and bold is the legislator who will seek to compel the great common carriers to adjust to an equitable basis transportation charges, but wiser still and more valuable to his community is he who will attempt to solve that transportation question by concentration of that product, so that the transportation company, instead of having the opportunity of hauling corn worth a cent a pound, he must ship swine worth from 5 to 10 cents a pound, reducing in that way the relative percentage of expense to value for transportation charges.

Some years ago a man whom I regard as one of the best financiers of my own State, discussing freight-rate problems, said:

Railway commissions and legislative maximum freight rates are all right, but that is not the way to beat the transportation company.

Our people are simply raising corn; it takes nearly 2 bushels of corn at this time to get the third bushel of corn to market. Feed it to your hogs, concentrate your product, your transportation burden will be relatively decreased; or feed your corn to your cattle and bring about a similar result; or, instead of shipping the beef, you may concentrate your product further, so that instead of shipping corn that will not pay its own way, ship butter, 1 pound of which will ship 15 of its kind.

This was many years ago; the large concentration of products in saving transportation costs has been doubled and in many cases trebled under the present rates and prices.

I see in the increased impetus of corn raising an increased impetus in swine producing and swine care. I believe that the Government will be doing no more than its economic duty if from time to time it shall, through liberal appropriations and zealous propaganda, teach the swine producers the use of the remedy in which the department has such faith, to the end that the loss to the producer of this property so generally owned may be reduced to a minimum, the high price of this important food be measurably reduced to the consumer, and the health of the public less seriously menaced.

The United States has more than one-third of the hogs of the world. It has less than one-sixth of the cattle and less than one-tenth of the sheep, so that the relative importance of the swine industry may be readily seen. The total value of cattle, including milch cows and beef-producing animals, in the 10 States—10 leading tick States, named in the order of their cattle interests: Texas, Oklahoma, Georgia, Mississippi, Arkansas, Alabama, Louisiana, North Carolina, Florida, and South Carolina—where the southern cattle tick operates is $287,914,000. The value of the hogs in those States amounts to $98,696,000, which is more than one-third of the cattle value. The value of the beef animals in those States is $162,361,000, so that as meat producers the hogs of those 10 States equal 60 per cent of their beef production. The value of the swine in the 10 leading swine-producing States—Iowa, Illinois, Nebraska, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Kansas, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan—not including any of the southern tick States, is $336,471,000.

As an economic factor the hog is entitled to the best of treatment. While not at any time appealing to the aesthetic or ever having been canonized, as a type of dignity he has usually "delivered the goods." He has that which many desire, and even Congressmen, having or desiring rivers and harbors, hover round his repository, "the barrel." This measure is calculated to fill the pork barrel instead of emptying it. He knows no State lines, and has not that regard to altitude, latitude, and longitude for which other meat animals are sticklers. Like a wealthy relative, he becomes most valuable when he dies a sudden and unnatural death. He has aided the pioneer to develop every State, has paid more store debts, bought more land, built more homes, lifted more mortgages, paid more freight, swelled more bank accounts, aided in the erection of more schools and churches, sent more young people to college, has been carried to more markets of the world, satisfied the hunger of more poor, tickled the palates of more rich, and regaled the tastes of more princes than any other meat-producing animal.

It can not be said of him that "he wants but little here below." He wants much; but he wants that not for long.

Remove the menace of cholera and he will become a mint for the free coinage of gold. He is more valuable than all the precious minerals of the mountains, because his veins are reliable and his stock being sold is no imposition upon the buyer.

Demonstrations by the Bureau of Animal Industry in cooperation with States and individuals to test thoroughly the Government's preventive remedy will be money and energy well spent, because if the Government has not an effective remedy, then one should be discovered and used.

The two most damaging diseases to meat animals in this country are hog cholera and the cattle tick. The loss from hog cholera is estimated at from fifteen million to forty-two million dollars annually for a period of years. I shall submit the figures for a long period of time. Then the loss from the cattle tick by death is estimated at from four to eight millions. That statement of $25,000,000 was inclusive of speculative losses. The estimates of Dr. Melvin for death losses are from four to eight millions. The other estimate, I repeat, is based on speculative losses, which reduce it to the basis of from four to eight millions. That is the rank of the two great diseases which reduce our general meat supply.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. How does the gentleman differentiate between speculative and actual losses?

Mr. SLOAN. When the animal dies the loss is complete; but there is an additional loss through the lack of growth and deterioration. That is speculative.

Mr. HOBSON. I can tell the gentleman that it is more than speculative. In one county where we eradicated the cattle tick we more than doubled the average value of all the cattle in that county.

Mr. SLOAN. It is still speculative, but the speculation approximates a certainty.

Mr. HOBSON. You ought to give an estimate, and I do not think the gentleman ought to count only the death loss, because the death loss is the smallest part of it. All the cattle in my district except that one county are infected with the cattle tick, and all the cattle in that county were infected until they eradicated it.

Mr. SLOAN. I want to say that on that same basis the Government, cooperating in these 10 States, has cleared a territory as great as the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and what was done in that work can be done throughout the United States with the hog cholera.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not question that.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the committee ought to understand this situation thoroughly before it agrees to increase this appropriation by $200,000. The situation is this: The item in the bill carries an appropriation now of $620,000. The current law carries an appropriation of $600,000. The committee increased that amount $20,000, and I want the committee to know that every dollar of the $620,000 carried in this bill is available for the use of demonstrating the best methods of preventing hog cholera. There can not be any doubt about that proposition, and the fact that this money has not been used in that direction heretofore is not a criticism of the Committee on Agriculture. It is not an evidence of the fact that we have overlooked the great hog industry of the country. It is hardly a criticism of the officials of the Agricultural Department. The fact is that the department, since 1903, has been sending out its bulletins on the prevention of hog cholera, and sending the serums out so that now 30 of the States are working on this very problem, through the serum idea.

Mr. GOOD. It is equally true that all of this $620,000 could be expended for one of a dozen different things, and not a penny of it spent for the eradication of hog cholera.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true, and that is exactly the point I was trying to bring out. It is a question that we must leave to the good judgment of the officials who execute the laws.

Now, some suggestion has been made in reference to the cattle-tick appropriation of $325,000. I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that this work has been in operation in the South for about eight years, but the first appropriation for the purpose of demonstrating the method of eradicating the cattle tick was only $50,000, and not $325,000. We are not certain that the $45,000 that the committee are willing to give will bring the result that we hope to have it bring, but we are willing to spend $45,000 in trying out the method, in trying to ascertain if the serums are, in fact, preventives. But I do not think this Congress ought to be asked to spend $200,000 to try out a proposition which may or may not be good. It seems to me the committee has acted wisely in the fact that it desired to start this work on a conservative basis. If it proves efficacious, if next year we have found a way of demonstrating that serum is a preventive of hog cholera, then I am sure this committee will give you every penny that the Department of Agriculture estimates for this great work. That is the sensible view for us to take. Try out the method; if it is efficient, give sufficient means to carry it to the people.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. How large a force has the department available to put into the field to guarantee the execution of this work?

Mr. LEVER. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman, I will say that I do not know how many men they have. I do not know that the department knows. Hence the committee took the sensible course and appropriated a small sum, in order that we might go at this work in a conservative rather than an extravagant manner. We are giving them nearly four times the amount that they have heretofore been using for this purpose.

Mr. HELM. So that if the committee were to vote the $200,000, you do not know whether the department could utilize that sum or not?

Mr. LEVER. Absolutely not; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] does not know it. Nobody knows how they would use it, or if they used it whether it would be beneficial to the country in doing what is sought to be done by this amendment. Let us be wise and start at this in a small way, and if it proves good this Congress will do the wise thing and make all appropriations necessary to give the Department of Agriculture sufficient means to carry on the work sought to be done.

Mr. TOWNER. I hope it will not be understood—it certainly is not so intended—that those who favor this additional appropriation intend thereby to cast any reflection or criticism upon the committee. On the contrary, I think the committee is remarkably responsive to the reasonable demands that are made. I am quite sure if this proposition had been originally urged before the committee an adequate appropriation would have been reported. When all the circumstances are known, this proposition ought to appeal to everyone. In the first place, it must not be understood that this serum is a cure for hog cholera. That is a mistake that not only Members of this House make, but many of the farmers of the United States have been making. It is not a cure, but it is an efficacious preventive of hog cholera. We can easily understand how much more difficult it is to get a man who has a herd of hogs that is not affected to use a preventive than it would be to get him to use a cure if his herd was affected. The work, therefore, must largely and must necessarily be a method of demonstration, a method of education, a method of taking into these communities where they raise hogs not only the serum itself, but the method of using it, and the necessity for using it, and a demonstration that its use is efficacious.

When it is understood that every State in the Union is a hog-raising State, when it is understood that interest in the prevention of this deadly plague must be universal throughout the United States, when it is understood that this work must be nation wide if it shall be carried on efficaciously, it seems to me that it must be apparent that this demonstration of the effective prevention of hog cholera must take an amount of work that will not be covered by an appropriation of $45,000. In my judgment $200,000 is a very small amount, and I venture to say that the next bill that will be brought in will contain an appropriation for this purpose very much larger than $200,000.

Mr. NYE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. Does the gentleman say that this is exclusively a preventive?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. NYE. And should every man that raises hogs get this serum to prevent hog cholera?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know exactly what is in the gentleman's mind.

Mr. NYE. I mean, if it is a preventive, must all farmers use it as a preventive?

Mr. TOWNER. That is not it. The idea is that when cholera breaks out those in the vicinity whose hogs are not affected ought to know how they can prevent their herds from being affected. The Government ought to be ready to send a man whenever there is an epidemic, so that they can take the serum there and demonstrate its use and educate these farmers who have herds in the immediate neighborhood how they can prevent loss from the epidemic.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. HELM. I am anxious to know how many hog doctors the Agricultural Department has available to use this $200,000?

Mr. TOWNER. It is not that. The Government of the United States can secure, if they have the funds, men in every State from the agricultural colleges who will do this without sending out men directly from the department. But the United States can not do it unless they have the money to pay for it, and unless they have the serum manufactured and made available.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman believe that the Government should go any further than to simply demonstrate work in this particular?

Mr. TOWNER. I do; because the Government ought especially to furnish the serum, for the reason that patent medicine men—the frauds all over the country, who are seeking to prey on the credulous farmer—finding that the use of a serum is considered effective, will assert that their private serum is better than any other, and thus sell the farmers worthless nostrums. They ought not to be put in a position where they can deceive the farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent that he have two minutes more.

Mr. LAMB. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand for the regular order is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this matter it is not my purpose to in any way reflect on the committee. On the contrary, I have only the greatest praise for the committee because I think they are doing a noble work, a work that means much to the country. This is an important matter. I heartily favor the $200,000 appropriation, and I hope the amendment will prevail. I hope, too, in the passage of the amendment, language will be employed that will restrict the expenditure of this money for this very important purpose.

In 1912 hog cholera cost the farmers of the Government $42,042,900. That presents a serious situation. It is not only a loss to the farmers but it is a loss to the whole country, and if we can secure a remedy against it it will save to the people of the country this enormous sum of money, which is quite worth while.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a sympathetic question?

Mr. EDWARDS. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. HOBSON. Under the present condition of manufacture it costs 90 cents to get serum enough to inoculate a hundred-pound hog. That is ridiculously high, but if you standardize and systematize it it ought not to be half that amount.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. I think the work of standardizing and systematizing it should be undertaken.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EDWARDS. Not just now. I have only five minutes. I believe this important work can best be done through the Department of Agriculture here. In Georgia, the State is undertaking to manufacture and furnish cholera serum to the farmers. I do not know just what the amount is that is being expended there, but it is not a very large amount. I am in favor of getting results, and I believe those results can best be gotten through the National Department of Agriculture, which can work in conjunction and cooperate with the various departments of agriculture in the several States.

As I was about to remark when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] interrupted me, in 1912 Georgia raised 2,098,000 hogs. Of that number 169,938 died from cholera. That amounted to a little more than 8 per cent of the total number of hogs raised in that State for 1912. The total value of the hogs raised in Georgia in 1912 amounted to $14,057,000. The total amount of loss through cholera in the State of Georgia in 1912 was $1,138,600. I appreciate what the State of Georgia has undertaken to do for the farmers in protecting the hogs against cholera, but I do not think it has gone far enough, and I do not think any of the States of the Union have gone far enough in this matter; and, with all due respect to this important committee, I do not believe this bill goes far enough in the matter. I hope the amendment making the appropriation will prevail.

As has been remarked by the gentleman from Iowa, the serum is not a cure. No more is it a cure for cholera than is vaccination a cure for smallpox, but it is a preventive. If it is used in time, it will prevent the cholera getting among the hogs, just as vaccination will prevent smallpox among people. It is my impression that the cost is about 90 cents for inoculating a hog.

Mr. HOBSON. That is a 100-pound hog?

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not understand that it makes any difference as to the weight.

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; it does vary with the weight.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then, it costs many times what it ought to cost, and I would welcome legislation and action that would not only make certain this remedy but give it to the people at a greatly reduced cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time for debate has expired. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa: Amend, at the end of line 12. Strike out the semicolon and insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, That of this sum not less than $45,000 shall be set aside for demonstrating the best method of preventing hog cholera."

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment at this juncture.

Mr. MANN. Why, it has been discussed here for half an hour.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. It comes too late.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment, or a substitute for the amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer a substitute for the entire amendment?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. LAMB. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is to vote on the amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will send it up.

Mr. HOBSON. The substitute is to strike out of the amendment the words "eight hundred and twenty thousand" and insert "seven hundred and ten thousand," thus cutting down the increase from $200,000 to $90,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that if the gentleman will offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa it would be in order, because the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is not an amendment except by way of a substitute.

Mr. HOBSON. Then I will make it an amendment to the amendment. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already an amendment pending.

Mr. HOBSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer it as a substitute to the entire amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I have some doubt whether my amendment is in order properly to the amendment and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment in the hope that the other amendment will be voted down and then I will offer this amendment following that.

Mr. HOBSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer also an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska can not withdraw his amendment except by unanimous consent. Does the Chair understand the gentleman asks unanimous consent?

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the figures "$820,000" and substitute therefor the figures "$710,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out "$820,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$710,000."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to ask the Chair whether this amendment carries any direction to the Secretary of Agriculture as to how this money shall be used?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not state——

Mr. HOBSON. I make the point of order it does not matter how it is used. The gentleman has not reserved any point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN), there were—ayes 19, noes 43.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD), there were—ayes 31, noes 35.

Mr. GOOD. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. GOOD and Mr. LAMB) reported that there were—ayes 45, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, at the end of line 12, by striking out the semicolon and inserting a colon and add the following: "Provided, That of this sum not less than $45,000 shall be set aside for demonstrating the best method of preventing hog cholera."

Mr. GOOD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the figures "$45,000" and inserting "$100,000" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the figures "$45,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD), there were—ayes 35, noes 47.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 12, page 11, after the figures "$720,000," amend by adding: "Not more than $30,000 of which sum may be applied to indemnifying the owners of milch cows condemned under section 2 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1895, and the regulations of the District of Columbia in relation thereto."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I ask unanimous consent that this may go over without prejudice until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. That there is no authority of law for paying for these cattle that are condemned. It has been ruled here year after year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers last year the exact point was up, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I have not been heard, I submit, on the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I ask unanimous consent that it go over until to-morrow, without prejudice.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LEWIS. I understand the matter goes over until to-morrow——

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. LEWIS. I can not hear the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the understanding of the Chair when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] made that request that objections were heard.

Mr. LEWIS. I wanted to discuss it. Now, I think I have a point that the Chair might wish to consider in that connection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Chairman for his courtesy.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this amendment makes no new appropriation. The section of the bill as already framed, as it has already passed through many Congresses, makes an appropriation for specific purposes, because it clothes the Secretary of Agriculture with the power to make applications of this appropriation in the line of the amendment, and he has made applications of the appropriation in that way.

The amendment does not, therefore, consist of an appropriation or new legislation, but consists of a limitation upon an appropriation, for under the statute as it is now, under the paragraph as at present framed, the whole $620,000 might be applied to this object, and the amendment restricts the appropriation to not more than $30,000, and I submit is therefore not subject to the point of order which has been made. The case is so wholly peculiar that the Chair ought to thoroughly understand these facts before making a renewed ruling.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. In regard to the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I was going to ask if it was not the custom of States to pay for cattle so afflicted?

Mr. LEWIS. The whole sum is appropriated for that purpose now, if the Secretary of Agriculture chose to so regard it, and the amendment amounts to a limitation upon an appropriation and not to an appropriation itself.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question bearing on that point? In what line of the paragraph does he find authority to use that appropriation for indemnifying owners of condemned tubercular cattle?

Mr. LEWIS. I will ask the chairman of the committee to reply to that question. There is no question of the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to apply the money in that way, and it is now applied in that way in the city of Washington.

Mr. LAMB. In view of this, as well as other matters relating to it, I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph go over until to-morrow without prejudice, when one of my colleagues from Virginia will be here who can not be here to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that this paragraph go over without prejudice.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order. Does the Chair desire to hear anything further on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman directs the Secretary of Agriculture to use the amount named in the amendment, $620,000, for a certain purpose, and even if it be true that the Secretary of Agriculture might in his discretion use the entire sum carried in the bill for the same purpose, it would still be a change of law to require him to use a specified portion of that sum for that purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. The amendment does not do so. He is expending now money for that purpose. This amendment restricts the amount to which he might otherwise be unrestricted, and which he might expend, to $30,000.

Mr. MANN. That is not how I heard the amendment read.

Mr. LEWIS. That is the purpose.

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 12, page 11, after the words "six hundred and twenty thousand dollars," amend by adding:

"Not more than $30,000 of which sum may be applied to indemnifying the owners of milch cows condemned under section 2 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1895, and the regulations of the District of Columbia in relation thereto."

Mr. MANN. That, of course, does not come in the proper place, but that is a matter easily corrected. The same question was up a year ago. While this, as the gentleman stated, does not authorize the Secretary to use it, it authorizes the Secretary to use it for a certain purpose affecting any discretion he has now, although I do not think the Secretary has any authority under the provisions of this act to pay for these milch cows.

Mr. LEWIS. It is conceded by the committee that he has, and he has acted upon it in the past.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is quite fair to say that it is conceded by the committee. It may be conceded by some. For one I take the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that there is no authority of law by which condemned cattle may be paid for except as they might be entering into interstate commerce. I will read, if the gentleman will permit:

The Secretary of Agriculture has the power to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuropneumonia—

And so forth.

Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland is to condemn these dairy cattle in the State of Virginia and in the State of Maryland and pay for them there regardless of the fact that they are about to enter into interstate commerce and thereby spread this disease from one State to another.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it is not a fact that part of this appropriation has been expended in the District of Columbia in payment for condemned animals?

Mr. MANN. Yes; but that is only in consequence of the department's construction.

Mr. LEVER. I believe that is simply a matter of construction.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair thinks there is no authority in the law, the Chair does not bother with the question as to whether somebody has expended the money improperly in one of the departments. The matter has been up on several occasions and has been thrashed out thoroughly both before and since the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] came into the House, and the ruling always has been that there was no authority in the law for the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for cattle condemned in Virginia or Maryland or other States having no relation to interstate commerce.

But the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] would authorize it, and it is for that purpose that it is intended. It would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture, when one of the inspectors goes into an adjoining State and finds something the matter with the cattle, to pay for those cattle, and if that is to be the policy of the Government, the same rule should be applied to payment for hogs that have been condemned on account of hog cholera under the provisions of this act. It has already been stated that that amounts to many, many millions of dollars a year.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the gentleman from Illinois think it quite fair to argue the supposed merits of this matter when the point of order is up and the argument should be confined to the point of order and not be upon the merits?

Mr. MANN. I am not arguing the supposed merits. I am arguing the point of order, pure and simple, as to what the effect of the ruling would be holding a provision of this sort in order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, is the Chair ready to rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, but the Chair will hear the gentleman from South Carolina if he desires to be heard.

Mr. LEVER. I was about to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the statement of fact made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] as to the Department of Agriculture having paid for cattle condemned in the District of Columbia is no doubt correct. There is no question about that. But I doubt the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to do that, although I have some recollection that he got his authority from an act relating to the District of Columbia, but there certainly can be found nowhere in any of the acts touching the establishment of the Bureau of Animal Industry or in legislation since its establishment which gives the Secretary of Agriculture the right to indemnify the owners of cattle that are killed, unless to prevent them from spreading from one State to another through the channels of interstate commerce, and the authority for that I read to the Chair a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] if he knows any authority of law for the payment of that except that portion of the statute which the gentleman from South Carolina has read?

Mr. LEWIS. And the departmental construction that has been given to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is that this exact matter has been before the committee some two or three times, and——

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Chair notice the expression here "to purchase diseased and exposed animals," and so on, in this last paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order is made against that, although it might be subject to it, but a point of order is made against this.

Mr. MANN. I know that the gentleman from Maryland does not intend to mislead the Chair, but that expressly provides in relation to animals going from one State to another.

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is that the other item referred to is substantially in the language of the law quoted by the gentleman from South Carolina. It is the opinion of the Chair that the amendment is not in order, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order to it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $325,000.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

Page 11, strike out the paragraph included in lines 13 and 14.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to certain provisions in this bill because I am opposed to paternalism of any kind, and there is more paternalism in this bill than in any other that can possibly come before Congress. It is hardly possible to so frame the Agriculture appropriation bill that all paternalism can be avoided. The best we can do is to reduce it to a minimum.

The paragraph we are now considering appropriates $325,000 for the purpose of eradicating cattle ticks. This matter refers to one section of the country, but is of national importance, and is defensible only on this account. In 1907 Congress began appropriating for the eradication of the cattle tick. They appropriated first $82,500. Next year they appropriated $150,000. For each year since then they have appropriated $250,000, and this year $325,000 is carried in this bill. Already there has been appropriated the sum of $1,232,500.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to ask the gentleman whether he makes a distinction between tick eradication, which, by the way, I want to tell him, is going on very successfully in my district—whether he makes any distinction between that and the various other processes that are usually termed "quarantine," as, for instance, the extinction of yellow fever or the checking of cholera or any other scourge that is brought from abroad or from State to State; not in any locality, but as an interstate matter? I wish to know whether he regards this particular work as distinguished from the other work of saving the public at large from a scourge?

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman's question is a very elaborate one, and I really have not the time in my five minutes to answer it; but I do not discover any similarity between a quarantine law preventing the spread of cholera from one State to another, or the smallpox from one country to another, and the eradication of the cattle tick. When they have smallpox in my community, and people are quarantined, the man who has smallpox pays the doctor if he is able, and if not the county pays the bill.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman realizes that all of this is based on quarantine?

Mr. BOOHER. I know. The eradication of the cattle tick has come down to be so simple that the man who has no brains at all can get rid of the ticks on his cattle. I can prove that from the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture. I am going to read from these hearings just what each State veterinarian who was before that committee said about it.

I want the committee to remember that it is the simplest thing in the world to eradicate the cattle tick. All a man has to do is to drive his cattle through a vat that contains the dip, and the ticks are gone. Yet by this bill you are appropriating $325,000 to help people help themselves. I have no objection to the Government spending money to find remedies for these things. I believe the Government ought to find the remedy, and after it finds the remedy I believe it ought to furnish it to the people, but I do not believe the Government ought to go over this country telling men how they must do everything, as this bill provides. Why not let the people depend somewhat upon their own intelligence?

Let us see about this. Let us take first the testimony of Dr. Dalrymple, State veterinarian of Louisiana. This is what Dr. Dalrymple said before the committee:

This tick eradication work is the simplest thing possible.

That is what the State veterinarian of Louisiana says. Then he goes on to say:

This dipping-vat process, with the standard arsenical solution, is absolutely the thing to do it with.

Now, you have a formula provided by the Government. It costs on an average $35 to build a vat and put your liquid in. You can fill it full and dip two or three hundred cattle. Yet you want $325,000 to enable you to do it.

How much has Louisiana appropriated to carry on this work? Five thousand dollars a year. Yet they say their loss in Louisiana is from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year. That State, in the face of that fact, appropriates only $5,000 each year to carry on that work.

Dr. Dalrymple goes on to say:

Our loss is from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 on acount of this cattle-tick business.

If it is true that you have so simple a remedy as Dr. Dalrymple says it is, I want to know why the people can not use it instead of asking Congress to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. LAMB. I hate to object, but we must get on with this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, we have not heard such a speech as this in a long time.

Mr. MANN. Can not the gentleman secure an agreement to close debate on this paragraph and amendments?

Mr. LAMB. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] five minutes.

Mr. BOOHER. No. I want to say to the committee that I tried to get time before the general debate closed to discuss this proposition, and I could not get it.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he allow 10 minutes on a side.

Mr. LAMB. Then, I will make it 20 minutes, 10 minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph be closed in 20 minutes, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] shall have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 20 minutes, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] shall have 10 minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will not object if I can have two minutes, for I want to offer an amendment and wish to say a word or two upon it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can have five minutes if he gets recognition from the Chair, as I do not want any time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOOHER. Now, I want to read further:

The CHAIRMAN. May I inquire what amount of money your State appropriated?

Dr. DALYRYMPLE. We have been appropriating $5,000 a year for the last seven years, but then our counties or our parishes, as we call them, have been giving money, and they are providing means in the way of building the dipping vats to be used in this work. I can not give the exact figures—I have not got them—but that is the amount of State money.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is the dipping compulsory?

Dr. DALYRYMPLE. It is; yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Over what portion of the State?

Dr. DALYRYMPLE. In our State it is compulsory in three of the northern parishes; it started on the northern tier of parishes, but we have carried the work forward in some of the interior parishes, and the local people are expending the money for vats in order to educate the people in the value of the work.

Mr. HAWLEY. How soon do you expect this whole State to be covered by this compulsory dipping law?

Dr. DALYRYMPLE. We want more Federal men, we want five more, I believe, now. The estimates for the Department of Agriculture were made up in September before the real facts in this case were known, I believe. Some of these gentlemen, I think, will be able to show you that a great many more men will be required than were thought necessary at that time. It is not a question of any department of the Government wanting this. We want it, the people of the South want it.

There you have got the State law in Louisiana, a compulsory law, compelling the people to dip their cattle. Why does the Government want to appropriate money when the State law has taken charge of them and compelled them to do their dipping? Now, I will turn to Dr. White, State veterinarian of Tennessee:

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Just one other question. You say you found the method of eradicating the ticks successful, and that it now is just a question of men and money?

Mr. WHITE. That is all there is to it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There is quite a strong feeling prevailing that when the Government has demonstrated the method of eradicating the ticks and has shown the people just how it can be done, and that it is reducible to a question of time and money, that it is then up to the local people to do the work themselves.

Mr. WHITE. That is for you people to say.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. What do you think of it?

Mr. WHITE. I do not think anything of it at all. I believe you folks ought to stay behind us and help us until we get out of it.

Mr. LEVER. Is it not a fact that the Government put you into it?

Mr. WHITE. They put us into it, and we want them to help us out.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Who put you in?

Mr. WHITE. The Federal Government put us in quarantine.

And now they want what? After dipping their cattle to destroy the ticks, and the Government has spent $1,230,000, they want $325,000 again, an increase of $75,000 this year. The thing goes on, and every witness testifies along the same line, that it is a simple matter and that it can be done by the people.

In the State of Georgia they have a law, as stated in this hearing, fining every man who refuses to dip his cattle, and the evidence before the committee was that the law was enforced compelling the people to dip their cattle. If it is a good law in Georgia, it ought to be a good law in every State. It seems to me that if the people are furnished with the remedy for the disease, they ought to use it themselves.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman speaks of the matter as if the appropriation was intended for one or two States in particular.

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, no; I did not mean to be so understood.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman so in his reference to Tennessee and Louisiana. I want to ask if the Government experimented in other States?

Mr. BOOHER. I referred to the State of Georgia especially, where they have a law that compels them to dip their cattle, and other States might well follow the example of Georgia.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. I will.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do not want to intrude on the gentleman, but perhaps his authority is incorrect, or the gentleman has by some lapsus designated Georgia instead of some other State. Whatever the witness may have said, there is no such law in Georgia. I do not mean to say that I do not think it would be a good law, but there is no such law there. The penal law applies only to the counties in Georgia now under quarantine, 14 in number, I believe. The other one hundred and thirty-odd counties are open to the ravages of the tick, and nothing done except on the volition of the cattle owners and no compulsory dipping law.

Mr. BOOHER. I will read what Dr. Bahnsen says:

Mr. LEVER. With this appropriation you are asking for, if the committee should allow it and Congress should allow it, how long would it take you to clean up this infested territory?

Mr. BAHNSEN. That was well stated by Dr. Dalyrymple. If we get sufficient cooperation so we can extend this work, then there would be no need of prolonging the work of tick eradication. Under such cooperation the fever ticks ought to be eradicated from the entire country in less than five years, if we get after it as we should. It is merely a question of men and money.

Mr. HAWLEY. Have you the power, under the laws of the State of Georgia, to compel people to dip their cattle?

Mr. BAHNSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Suppose they do not dip, do you dip at their expense and charge it to them or do you destroy the cattle?

Mr. BAHNSEN. Our law gives us authority to quarantine their cattle and for compulsory dipping. If they fail to dip, we prosecute them for a misdemeanor, and I want to say that the courts have backed us up in each of the instances. Whenever we get a man before the courts for a violation of the quarantine law they never fail to fine him. Of course, the fines are merely nominal—$10, $15, or $25, and costs—but we find in every instance it is sufficient to make them come right up.

Mr. HAWLEY. The people fined, then, have their cattle dipped?

Mr. BAHNSEN. Either that or they remove them without receiving a permit.

Mr. HAWLEY. I mean after you have prosecuted a man for not dipping his cattle and then he is fined, does he then dip his cattle?

Mr. BAHNSEN. Yes, sir; they do not fail to do it after they have been through court once.

Mr. RODDENBERY. That is just what I want to bring out. We are under Federal statute and regulation; we are not under any State law. The Government authorities are authorized to fix the cattle-tick zone. Now, the extreme northeastern part of the State is in the cattle-tick zone. I apprehend that Dr. Bahnsen, in his testimony, had reference only to the counties in Georgia now under Government surveillance. The prosecution results from the Federal legislation or regulation that authorizes them to fix the tick quarantine zone. Seven-eighths, at least, of the State of Georgia is not within the tick-treatment zone, and very little dipping and no prosecutions in other parts of the State, presumably because it is not yet under Federal jurisdiction. I hope to see this appropriation made and the work extended.

Mr. BOOHER. I am reading from the testimony before the committee. Dr. Bahnsen says that they have a law in Georgia, and that it is enforced. If they have not got it, the witness made a mistake.

Mr. RODDENBERY. He is correct, but his statement, without explanation, is susceptible of a misconstruction.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to show the difference between what the people down there do and what the people do in other localities for the same thing. In Kansas the people are threatened with a destruction of their wheat crops from chinch bugs. They did not come to Washington to get an appropriation from Congress to sprinkle something on the wheat. What did they do? Let me read. I took this from a newspaper. This is dated at Wichita, January 4:

A committee of grain men and millers was appointed here to-day to organize the farmers of the Southwest to prevent the destruction of the 1913 crop by chinch bugs. Fields are to be burned over to kill the bugs. The weather has been so warm that the bugs are alive in the grassland and stubble fields.

The people of Kansas ought to have come to Congress and gotten an appropriation; they should have secured some expert from the department to go down there and teach them how to burn over their stubble fields. Mr. Chairman, the people ought to protect themselves. The Government has expended $1,232,000 finding a means for destroying the ticks. They have furnished it to the people where these infected districts are. Two of the States have compulsory laws to compel dipping. Why do not the others have those laws. Take the sheep quarantine as an example. There is a quarantine against the western sheep. When they come into the stockyards of the country and you go there to buy your sheep, to take them out and feed them, you can not get them out of the stockyards without dipping, and what do you have to do? The man who buys the sheep is compelled to have them dipped in the presence of an expert, either from the State or from the Federal Government, and he has to pay for the dipping himself, at the rate of 3 cents a head.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. I want to ask if the gentleman does not misunderstand the theory of this appropriation. It is rather for the protection of those regions where the tick is unknown than for the extirpation of the tick directly——

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, no.

Mr. TAGGART. Inasmuch as cattle infested with that tick will cause certain death to other cattle just as soon as the tick leaves them and goes onto the sound cattle.

Mr. BOOHER. My friend from Kansas knows that they have a quarantine against these cattle and they can not get them to market in certain seasons without complying with the quarantine laws.

Mr. TAGGART. Rather than run the risk of that, we are willing to pay our share of this, if we can extirpate the tick.

Mr. BOOHER. Then we ought to pay our share for eradicating every disease that is known to man and animals alike, and then we ought to make an appropriation for everything that somebody imagines is the matter with him, and we ought to make an appropriation of a million dollars for hog cholera. That is just as important as this matter, and more so. The loss from that, largely, is more than from the cattle tick. Yet when they discover means to prevent hog cholera or a cure for it, if I were in Congress I would vote against an appropriation of a single dollar to send men out to do the work the farmer should do for himself. When the remedy is furnished by the Government let the farmer follow directions and do it himself. A few years ago in my country they had an epidemic of blackleg among young cattle. They did not appeal to the Government for experts to go there and doctor their cattle. The Government found a serum that would cure it and furnished it to the States, and the cattle raisers bought it and used it themselves, without the benefit or advice of any expert. I hope this appropriation will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, but the fact remains that the Government has at its expense found a remedy that will destroy the cattle ticks that not only infest the Southern States but that threaten to infest other States if these cattle are shipped to them. The Government knows this and it has quarantined the tick-infected section of the country against the shipment of their cattle. Now, to say that the Government shall stop its aid in cooperation with the States toward the destruction of the cattle tick in that section of the country will simply be saying to us keep your cattle on that side of the line, you can not ship them into other sections of this great country. I want to say that the Government will not take that backward step. This section will keep up this operation until the cattle tick is wiped off the face of the map. One hundred and sixty-five thousand square miles have already been relieved of the cattle tick by means of the dipping process brought to us by the Federal Government. Understand, it is not the Southern States alone who are interested in this great proposition, but you can take every State in this Union where the people are now denied meat for their table because of the exorbitant price that must be paid for it, and it is in the interest of the great mass of American people that we plead for this appropriation that the great breeding grounds of the South may be used to graze cattle that may go into every market in the world.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I have not the time—only five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Just for a question.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Go ahead.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman just voted against the proposition to appropriate $200,000 additional for the prevention of hog cholera.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman that when the Government gets beyond the experimental stage in the matter of the hog-cholera proposition and has reached the successful remedy, as in the cattle-tick proposition, I will vote $200,000 and even $325,000. [Applause.] I am for something that has already been proven. I voted for the $45,000 that we may advance the work on hog cholera, as the cattle-tick work has passed beyond experiment to a demonstrated fact. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in my State a part of it is above the quarantine line and a part of it below the quarantine line, and the people of my own State are spending of their own funds hundreds of dollars making these dipping vats, and I have seen thousands of head of cattle in my own county driven through them that the tick might be eradicated, as it is eradicated. When we come with the proposition that the Government has entered on this work so successfully now, shall we take a backward step? As is shown by the hearings read here, the western country, from where the cattle used to come in great herds, are going into agricultural interests. In my own State it is going into agricultural interests, and we must have breeding grounds for our cattle. What better breeding grounds can we find, so far as the soil, the climate, than in that section of the country where the boll weevil has increased? And what greater work can be done in those Southern States than to continue this successful work till the cattle tick shall be a thing of ancient history? We must wipe it out, and why not wipe it out at one fell swoop, as our committee thought we could do by this appropriation? [Applause.] Think of it, Mr. Chairman! Within the past six years there has been a decrease of 10,000,000 head in our cattle supply. No wonder the high price of our meat products. It is suicidal not to conserve this great industry, and Congress ought not to be guilty of the folly of striking the one fatal blow that of necessity further adds to the shortage of this great source of wealth. This appropriation should remain intact.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] to strike out the paragraph ought not to prevail. I agree with him heartily in part in what he has said to the effect that after the Government has experimented and learned the means and methods by which the disease may be prevented or cured, and it comes merely to the question of men and money, the local people ought to bear all or a large part of the expense. I have offered an amendment—it is in the hands of the reading clerk to be read—which I think will perfect this section and make it unobjectionable. This paragraph calls for $325,000. My amendment would forbid the use of any portion of that money in the purchase of materials for or in the construction of dipping vats upon land the title of which is not in the United States, except at fairs or expositions where the Department of Agriculture makes an exhibit or a demonstration; and that no part of this money shall be used in the purchase of material for the mixture used in the vats, except when used for the purpose of experimenting or demonstration under the charge or direction of the Bureau of Animal Industry. Now, it seems to me that with the adoption of that amendment, with the qualification and limitation of the department in the use of this money, the objection made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] would be overcome. A portion of this money has been used in an objectionable way in the building of vats upon private property, a work that ought to be done by the private individual, an expense that ought to be borne entirely by him.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman think if his amendment prevails that the amount carried by the bill ought to be reduced?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do not know; I am not well enough informed about that; but gentlemen in charge of the bill can tell of the work to be done by the bureau under this appropriation. As has been said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], large sections of the country have been quarantined and no shipment of cattle from them to other sections is permitted. There must be inspection; agents of the bureau are required for that. When these sections are released certificates have to be issued. There is considerable work and a considerable expense in that line, but, in my judgment, money should be spent only for that purpose and for giving instruction where it has not already been given.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I think the limitation my amendment would place on the use of this money would make the paragraph proper; we can fix the amount later.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman does not think, does he, that you can use it for anything else than eradicating the southern cattle tick? You can not use it for quarantine purposes?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I think it can be so used. I think a part of the money heretofore appropriated is used for inspection and quarantining and the issuing of certificates for releasing territory that has been freed from the pest.

Mr. BOOHER. Is there not a provision for cattle inspectors for the express purpose of inspecting the cattle?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes. But part of this money is used for that purpose too.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not think you can divert that money from the purposes mentioned in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be read and be pending before the committee while the other amendment is under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the only amendment before the committee is the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] to strike out the paragraph. The vote is on that amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOOHER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I now offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Amend, page 11, at the end of line 14, by inserting the following:

"Provided, however, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the purchase of materials for or in the construction of dipping vats upon land not owned solely by the United States, except at fairs or expositions where the Department of Agriculture makes exhibits or demonstrations; nor shall any part of this appropriation be used in the purchase of materials or mixtures for use in dipping vats except in experimental or demonstration work carried on by the officials or agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. LAMB. That is already a part of the law, I think. I will not object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that all debate on the paragraph and the amendment thereto has been closed.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and the necessary alterations of buildings thereon, and the necessary expenses for investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products, $78,680.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do not find anything in the hearings relating to this paragraph or I did not succeed in getting the hearings relating to it. How many acres in this farm at Bethesda, Md.?

Mr. LAMB. This is an experimental farm out here of about 60 or 70 acres, possibly more——

Mr. COX. It seems that $78,680 is a tremendous amount of money to be expended on a farm of that size.

Mr. LAMB. There is where they develop the serum; there is where they experiment with it, and a good deal of this appropriation is for burning up buildings that have been infected or diseased by cattle. This experimental work in diseases of hogs and cattle is carried on at this farm.

Mr. COX. You say that there are 60 or 70 acres in that farm?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. COX. What becomes of this tremendous sum of money—$78,680? How is that expended? In the way of salaries?

Mr. LAMB. Salaries constitute a good deal of it—indeed, the largest part of the appropriation.

Mr. COX. In that connection I would like to ask the gentleman if a large amount of this $78,000 in this item does not go for increases of salary?

Mr. LAMB. I will look up the salary account, but I would like to say to my friend in the meantime, by way of parenthesis, that if he will take a car and go there and look at it he will see exactly what it is.

Mr. COX. I have not got the time to go out there at this time to see about it. I want to know the general character of the work. I find on the next page an item for $16,500 for the construction of a building down there, making a total of over $95,000 to be expended in the coming year on that farm.

Mr. LAMB. I will give the gentleman an itemized account of it. I have it here among my papers.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] is looking up the exact appropriations for the different lines of work at that experiment station I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] that under this item the work at Bethesda, Md., is carried on. They own something like 60 acres of land out there, and they are carrying on the work of studying the various diseases that afflict the various species of farm animals of the country. They are engaged in preparing serums, toxins, tuberculin and other remedies that are designed to prevent the spread of contagious diseases among farm animals.

Most of this money, I will say to the gentleman, is being expended in the way of salaries and in the way of alteration of buildings, the fumigation of buildings, and sometimes the tearing down of buildings that have become infected and the construction of other buildings in which to take care of the animals upon which they are experimenting. It is one of the most interesting places near the city of Washington, and I would be glad if sometime my friend would go out there and see the enormous amount of scientific and investigational work that they are doing.

They are studying the problem of tuberculosis in cattle, with a view of developing whether milk or butter or cream will convey the tuberculosis germ from the cow to the human family. They are studying hog cholera and chicken cholera. They are studying the problem of inbreeding and a number of other problems connected with animal husbandry in the country.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that they go out and buy animals for this purpose and experiment with them?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly. They must have animals to experiment with; for instance, they take a hog and inject into it cholera virus, and give the hog a good case of cholera; or they will take a cow and infect it with cattle tick and see if they can obtain a remedy for that disease. It is all work done for the benefit of human kind. It is one of the most important branches of the work done by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. COX. What is the connection between Bethesda farm, in Maryland, and that at Beltsville?

Mr. LEVER. The Beltsville farm is a piece of land of about 400 acres, about 14 miles from the Capitol, out in Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more for the purpose of getting information about this 100-acre farm.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. What do they do at the Beltsville farm?

Mr. LAMB. Let us take up one farm at a time.

Mr. LEVER. If my friend from Virginia will permit me, I will say to the gentleman that I took a trip up to Beltsville not long since. They are studying at Beltsville the problems of dairying, largely. They are making an effort to find a model farm for the average dairyman in the United States. They are studying the problem of milk. They are studying the problem of silos, whether they should be built out of wood or built out of cement. They are studying the proper kind of food for their cattle and their calves. They are studying the entire problem of dairying with a view at some time in the future of issuing a bulletin to the dairy farmers in the United States which will give them information as to the best and most practical and profitable kind of dairy that they can run.

Mr. COX. Do they produce any revenue to the Government from this work?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman give us any idea of how much this farm produced last year?

Mr. LEVER. I can not give the exact amount that is produced there, but I know that the health department here is receiving milk from the Beltsville dairy. In addition to that, they are studying the problem of poultry breeding, and hog breeding, and all the various problems connected with the farm, including problems relating to cattle. Everything that is killed or can be sold there is sold, and the revenues therefrom are turned into the Federal Treasury.

Mr. COX. It is nothing like self-sustaining, is it?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, of course not. You can not expect any scientific investigation to be self-sustaining. It is not intended to be such.

Mr. COX. Is any part of this appropriation here used for the purpose of increasing salaries?

Mr. LEVER. I think not.

Mr. LAMB. There is a statement of salaries, and I will say to the gentleman that on pages 24 and 25 you will find an itemized account of everything that is expended there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more. This is an important subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. I read from the hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture. I want to say that committee is doing fine work. This is a statement, made before that committee, of the maner in which this appropriation is expended:

Expended from the lump-fund appropriation "General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry, 1912 (diseases of animals)," during the period between July 1, 1911, and June 30, 1912.

For investigations and experiments in the study of animal diseases, with a view of developing methods for the eradication and control thereof	$12,858.20
For experiments and investigations in the study of hog cholera, and for conducting experiments concerning the practical application of antihog-cholera serum for combating hog cholera	9,172.73

For experiments and investigations in cooperation with the Pennsylvania Live Stock Sanitary Board in the study of milk hygiene	$1,387.40
For miscellaneous investigations and experiments in studying infectious animal diseases	3,742.55
For investigations of the frozen and desiccated egg industries, with special reference to the bacterial content of the finished products and the sources of contamination	1,939.52
For miscellaneous experiments and investigations in the study of roundworms, gid, and tapeworms in sheep, parasites of hogs, and measles of sheep and cattle, and the treatment of cattle mange	10,245.77
For repairs, improvements, and general maintenance of the Experiment Station, Bethesda, Md., and for conducting experiments and investigations there concerning the study of tuberculosis, Texas fever, and other diseases of animals	30,691.57
Total expenditures under the appropriation for diseases of animals	70,037.74

Mr. COX. That was last year's appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. That was last year's appropriation; and this appropriation is like last year's appropriation.

Mr. LAMB. Now, let me say in reply to the question that was asked a while ago, the whole increase of salaries in this bureau amounts to $280—that is, outside of the inspection of cattle and hogs.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general administrative work, including traveling expenses and salaries of employees engaged in such work, rent outside of the District of Columbia, office fixtures and supplies, express, freight, telegraph, telephone, and other necessary expenses, $40,186.

Mr. HAYDEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, after line 8, page 12, by inserting a new paragraph, as follows:

"For all necessary expenses for experiment in the feeding and breeding of ostriches and for investigations and experiments in the study of the ostrich industry, $2,500."

Mr. LAMB. I reserve the point of order on that.

[Mr. HAYDEN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to know what the point of order of the gentleman from Virginia is.

Mr. LAMB. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAMB) there were—ayes 25, noes 17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Meat inspection, Bureau of Animal Industry: For additional expenses in carrying out the provisions of the meat-inspection act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 674), there is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the sum of $200,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph and would like to know the necessity for it.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this is a new item—an increase of $200,000. The increase is needed to efficiently carry on meat inspection, not only because the work is expanding, but also because with the sum now provided, $3,000,000, proper increases in salaries can not be made to experienced employees. The total number of employees is about 2,400. The average salary is low. It is impossible to properly conduct the inspection without retaining in the service these experienced and, therefore, most valuable employees. Unless promotions are made many of these employees will leave the service, and their places will necessarily be filled by others, inexperienced and more or less inefficient. If the gentleman will examine the hearings on this matter, he will find that we interrogated Dr. Melvin and his assistant about it. They stated the number of men that were employed, and that it was necessary in order to carry on this work that this increase should be made. I want to say that we cut the sum down from the amount estimated.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I read the hearings, and I do not know whether the position taken by Dr. Melvin is correct. That is to say, that this money is needed in order to hold these employees.

Mr. LAMB. That is a part of it.

Mr. COX. How much of this $200,000 will go to increase the salary of employees? As a matter of fact, does not practically all of it go there?

Mr. LAMB. The bulk of it, I think, will, because that is what it is for. They have 2,400 employees. They have a brigade of men employed in this important work that touches the homes of so many people.

Mr. COX. Does not 90 per cent of it go to increase the salaries of the employees?

Mr. LAMB. I think so.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman contend that there is any law on which to base this appropriation?

Mr. LAMB. There is law for the $3,000,000 to carry on the work, and the same authority that made the $3,000,000 to do this work can add $200,000 to it.

Mr. COX. But I ask the gentleman if there is any law for this increase?

Mr. LAMB. No particular law for the increase; no.

Mr. MANN. There is the law providing for the inspection.

Mr. LAMB. That is the law creating the department, and we are the lawmaking body, and we can make the law.

Mr. COX. How many new places are to be made with this $200,000 appropriation?

Mr. LAMB. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Very few.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman give us any idea how many new places will be created?

Mr. LAMB. I did not ask Dr. Melvin. I trust him, and I think this House can trust him.

Mr. COX. I do not remember Dr. Melvin being asked that question.

Mr. LAMB. We did not ask him.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] will permit, Dr. Melvin's testimony does not appear in the printed hearings. When the committee reached his bureau in its order in taking up the estimates, Dr. Melvin was in the West, and Dr. Farrington, the next in rank, appeared before the committee. Later on, however, the subcommittee took up the whole proposition with Dr. Melvin. That testimony was not taken stenographically. My recollection of his testimony is that there were some eight or ten or perhaps a dozen packing houses to which he desired to extend the meat-inspection service, and that would take probably 25 per cent of the appropriation asked for.

Mr. COX. That is the extension work.

Mr. LEVER. And the appropriation asked for was $300,000. The committee allowed only $200,000. I take it that something like $150,000 of the $200,000 appropriated here will be used in the promotion of employees in the inspection service.

Mr. COX. And in the increase of salaries?

Mr. LEVER. In the promotion and increase of the salaries at the top of the line in order that men at the bottom of the line may be moved up and given a reasonable salary.

Mr. COX. And the other $50,000 for the extension of the work?

Mr. LEVER. I give that as an estimate, from my recollection of the testimony.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that Dr. Melvin stated there were now 940 packing houses and 8 or 10 new packing houses asking for this service, and he said it required about $100,000 to meet the requirements of this extension work, and $200,000 was intended for the increase, which makes $100,000 available for increase of salaries and $100,000 for taking care of this work.

Mr. LAMB. And probably Dr. Melvin was expending the money upon that basis.

Mr. LEVER. I regard this as a very meritorious proposition. The gentleman from Indiana knows, of course, that the meat-inspection law carries a total appropriation of $3,000,000. That is a permanent law. They have run that appropriation the past fiscal year within $20,000. That is skating on thin ice to keep men out of the penitentiary. No promotions have been made in the last six years, I believe. No examinations have been held for any inspectors in the last six years. These men work down there standing in blood half knee deep, and go through the horrid process of examining these animals from day to day and hour to hour, working 10 and 14 hours a day, and I believe they are entitled to some promotion and some consideration from this House.

Mr. COX. Let me ask this question there. Is not there some way of incorporating in this bill some time in the future this compensation and salaries so that Members of the House could get at it? Now, here is a lump-sum appropriation of practically $3,000,000 from which these employeees are paid. I would like to see it in the bill itself. It would not make the bill very cumbersome.

Mr. LAMB. Get the Book of Estimates and look and see for yourself, and I will say to the gentleman that all of this money is used for the salaries and traveling expenses, and that is the sum total of this whole thing.

Mr. COX. I quite agree with the gentleman in that, so far as traveling expenses are concerned, because the travel is $358,000 for the Bureau of Animal Industry alone.

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary to get the Book of Estimates, because under the law the Secretary of Agriculture is required to make a report annually, which he does——

Mr. COX. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Giving in detail the expenditures and salaries.

Mr. LEVER. And that is in the report of the committee——

Mr. BOOHER. May I ask the gentleman a question? Now, as I understand, the intention is that this amount is to be applied wholly to promotions?

Mr. LEVER. No; the intention is that it is to be applied, part to the additional service and part to the increase in the salaries of employees.

Mr. BOOHER. What proportion do you estimate will be applied to promotions and paying better salaries?

Mr. LAMB. I do not understand that over $50,000 or $75,000, but my friend from Iowa disagrees and thinks about $100,000 will be used for the purpose of extending the service and $100,000 for the promotion of employees.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the statement made by Dr. Melvin before the committee.

Mr. LAMB. I think the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. BOOHER. Will these promotions be made from the lower grades?

Mr. LEVER. These promotions are to be made from the lower grades. It is a meritorious proposition, and I hope nobody will make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me just a second. A large number of these employees entered the service some years ago under a schedule which was announced by the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture stating that certain increases of salary would be made after a certain length of service.

Men went into the service with the statement from the Department of Agriculture that under the $3,000,000 appropriation, after a year or two years or different years, that promotions would be made and increases of salaries would be made. And that could be done under the $3,000,000 appropriation if there had not been such an extension of the service made necessary by the new packing houses throughout the country. In order to give the service to the packing houses, the Secretary was unable to carry out the pledge that was made to these employees for any increase. They are now threatened with a wholesale resignation of employees, and probably it would be an impossibility at present to obtain men with sufficient knowledge to do this work.

Mr. LAMB. They lost 200 last year, I will say.

Mr. MANN. Many of these men are required to be expert veterinarians, having passed an examination as veterinary surgeons after going through veterinary colleges; and the salaries are very small, in any event.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, the only way we can extend this service on the one hand and give these men who have been working at a low salary for six years any increase at all is to allow the appropriation in this bill to stand.

Mr. COX. In this extension work they only propose to extend it, do they not, in factories where commodities enter into interstate commerce?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly. There are some 8 or 10 of those where they desire to extend the service.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask most earnestly that the point of order be withdrawn and the objection waived. There is an impression that these men are all employed in one or two places. Let me call your attention to the fact that there are now in the employ of the Government 2,374 of these employees. They are performing their duties in 940 different establishments, that are located in 259 different towns and cities, and that the highest wages paid to an ordinary meat inspector is $100 a month; that an assistant meat inspector is paid $1,000 a year, as the highest wages, but the great bulk of them are working at $840 a year. The figures show that but 282 of these inspectors are getting $1,200, 31 are getting $1,100, and some 644 are receiving $1,000 a year. Three hundred and thirteen of them are working for $840 per annum. They are really in charge of one of the most important duties that is performed by this Government. It is their duty to see to it that unwholesome meats that might communicate diseases to one-half of the people of the United States that now use and consume the meats which are inspected by these men do not enter into interstate commerce. Of course, no institution that does not do interstate commerce can be inspected by the Government. There is a demand by the people for this inspection, and it is difficult to get men of intelligence and character who will stay there in the blood and in the horrible surroundings of a meat inspector from day to day for less wages than are ordinarily paid for scientific work. The majority of men could not stand it. It is a great injustice to require men to work for $840 a year at such work as that. All of this appropriation will not be used——

Mr. COX. How many hours a day do they work?

Mr. TAGGART. They work indefinitely. It depends on the work in hand.

Mr. COX. How many days leave of absence do they have in a year?

Mr. TAGGART. Fifteen, I think; perhaps 30.

Mr. COX. Do they have any sick leave?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes; if a man is too sick to work.

Mr. COX. Do they have any sick leave for which they are paid?

Mr. TAGGART. No; I do not think so.

Mr. COX. How many days do they put in?

Mr. TAGGART. They put in as many days as the establishment works.

Mr. COX. They are not required to work on Sunday?

Mr. TAGGART. Not ordinarily. I do not think they do any work on Sunday.

Mr. COX. They put in 313 days less their leave of absence, whatever that might amount to?

Mr. LEVER. Fifteen days as against 30 days here in Washington.

Mr. TAGGART. One of those inspectors working in one of those great packing houses going at its full capacity will inspect a beef in 48 seconds. That is one of the reasons the service ought to be extended. A beef is slaughtered every 48 seconds in one of those great packing houses.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, I have watched these men in the packing houses and, as I recollect, they stand right at the point of slaughter, do they not?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes; they do.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is a very disagreeable job, and as I watched them it struck me that they not only had to be very agile, but also very expert, as the carcass goes along, to detect tuberculosis.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, let no man understand that they are a rough class of men who have that work to perform. They pass a civil-service examination, and a large number of them are very intelligent young men.

Mr. COX. Are there any eligibles on the waiting list for those jobs at the present time?

Mr. TAGGART. There is no examination except the civil-service examination which they have to undergo.

Mr. COX. Somebody said that some of these men have quit. I want to know if the Government has had any trouble in filling the vacancies.

Mr. TAGGART. They fill the vacancies that occur with such men as they can get.

Mr. LEVER. There is no more trouble in filling vacancies there than there would be in filling vacancies in Congress, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Is it not true that these men not only have to pass an examination but they have to be graduates of certain colleges before they can take the examination?

Mr. LAMB. That is the case with the veterinarians. They have to do that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think that unless this $200,000 appropriation is allowed, long-delayed justice will be withheld from a class of men who have been giving the Government a service that is far in excess of the compensation they have received. There is no work in the Government service more arduous or where more painstaking care must be had than in this service.

In the great packing houses of Chicago the men employed as Government meat inspectors work from 12 to 16 hours a day. There is no regulation as to what number of hours they shall be employed. Before they go into the service in many cases they must have been graduated as veterinary surgeons, and those who are now in the lower grades in this great service have been in the service at the same rate of pay for more than six years.

For $840 per annum the men in this service are doing a work that is paid almost double that amount by private enterprise. There is no reason why the Government of the United States should not be as good an employer as a private employer is.

These men are high-class men. They are educated for the particular work that they are called upon to do. They devote a number of years of their lives to learning the business in which they are about to engage, and what they learn is of no use whatever to them if they leave the Government service, whereas a man who learns a trade and engages in private employment can find a number of places where he can get a job if he is turned out of work by any one concern. So that it seems to me there is more reason than ever before for giving due consideration to these men.

If you make a point of order against this provision in the bill, it would not only do a great injustice to a worthy class of men, but it would retard in a large sense the extension of the inspection service to the new houses that have been constructed since the last appropriation bill was passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois concede that there is no authority of law for this?

Mr. MADDEN. No; on the contrary, I believe there is authority of law for it. In the first place, the Congress of the United States, when the inspection law was enacted, made a permanent appropriation of $3,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything in that law that will prohibit Congress from making an additional appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. No. On the contrary, I believe that the law then gave ample power to Congress to increase the appropriation from time to time to meet the growing needs of the service.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing pending before the committee; simply a point of order has been reserved.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I entertain no doubt that the item is subject to a point of order, under the facts elicited by the answers of the members of the committee reporting the bill, to the questions which have been propounded to them.

I do not want to do these employees or any other employees any injustice. While it has been disclosed that a large number of them, 200 or 230 of them, have quit within the last year, that fact does not appeal to me, because I have always clung to the idea throughout my life, and I think I will to the end, that a man is to a large extent the architect of his own fortune and can choose his own profession and calling in life. I do not know why these men quit this employment, but the chances are that they sought out better and more remunerative employment, and quit for that reason. We have no assurance whatever that if this appropriation is permitted to stand and these employees go ahead and become more and more efficient and useful to the Government as inspectors, that private employment in the course of another year will not take them from the Government of the United States. I know of no rule and no law that Congress could pass that could ever prohibit that. We have that to contend with practically in every department of this Government, and always will have it to contend with, that the wage earner will seek the place where he can get the most for his labor. So, as I say, that argument does not appeal to me.

Neither do some other arguments appeal to me, because I take it that the Government is easily able to fill these places. I have nothing to base this statement upon, other than facts which have come to my notice heretofore, but I undertake to say that now there are a large number of men waiting upon the eligible list to take these places.

But for fear that I might do an injustice to some deserving employees, and for the further reason that it might cripple the Government in this extension work, I will withdraw my point of order at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire further to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. If there is any subject that is of interest to mankind, which needs a thorough, scientific investigation, I think it is the meat that is offered for sale in the American market. I do not know what is the cause, neither have I been able to learn why the inspection has not revealed the reason the meats on our markets to-day are in such a deplorable and, I say, unwholesome condition. You can scarcely go to the market and buy a cured ham but what it looks you in the face and tells you that it is your deadly enemy as soon as you place it on the table. If these men who have been inspecting the meats of this country are not scientific men, then I say the Government ought to replace them with a good corps of experts. If their salaries are inadequate to enable them to discharge that high and most necessary duty of inspecting the meats of this country, their salaries ought to be increased so that they may devote their time solely to this most important subject.

While I am on the floor I desire to ask my friend who has just made a speech upon this question, my colleague, the gentleman from Chicago, Mr. MADDEN, if these inspectors inspect any other kind of meat than the live animal, to see whether it is diseased just before slaughter.

Mr. MADDEN. They inspect both before and after killing.

Mr. FOWLER. Do they inspect the methods of curing and packing?

Mr. MADDEN. They inspect the whole thing from start to finish.

Mr. FOWLER. Do they inspect the storage of meat in cold-storage houses in the great centers?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not sure about that.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to see the greatest experts in this or any other country put on the heels of these cold-storage people.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is usually correct in his statements of fact which he makes here upon this floor, but I would like to have some authority for the statement he makes that the meats which are sent out by this country are diseased. I do not believe the statement is correct.

Mr. FOWLER. I state what I do know from personal experience. I do not believe that there is a cured ham in the city of Washington or on the American market but what is injured by chemicals which have been injected into it, unless it has been cured on the farm by the old common-sense method of smoking it with sassafras and hickory.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Or with corncobs.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; and with corncobs.

Mr. JACKSON. I assume that the gentleman is an eater of ham, and yet he looks healthy.

Mr. FOWLER. I have taken a small portion within the last day, and it is from this experience that I am talking on the ham question now.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman does not mean to have us infer that his statement comes from indigestion?

Mr. FOWLER. Not at all; but I repeat that if there is a subject that I would go further in making appropriations of money it is on the subject of the inspection of meats in this country. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois ought not to go unchallenged.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SLOAN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I make a point of order that that comes too late.

Mr. SLOAN. Then, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement of two or three minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask the privilege of making a statement, so that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] shall not go unchallenged. He practically charged that the meat products of our farms throughout the United States are unhealthful and unmarketable. I challenge the correctness of that statement, and the gentleman ought not to have made it.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I do not yield.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to say to the gentleman he ought to be fair.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not desire a lecture from the gentleman from Illinois. I am talking of a subject here that is important to the American people, because the products of our farms are largely reduced to meats, and we depend on the markets of America and the world to effect good sales. I think before the gentleman from Illinois says that our hams or meats, or anything else, are diseased, unclean, or anything of that kind, he should have made use of the information which was within his reach, and is within the reach of every Member of the House. The Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department of this House during the last session took evidence day in and day out on the subject, and the evidence is there, clear and unmistakable, so that he who runs may read, that the meat inspection in this country is practically efficient, and that the large bulk of our beef and pork products, going to every part of the United States and the world, is pure, healthful, and fit to be put upon any market in any city or country in the world. [Applause.] It ill becomes a Member of this House to slander the products of America's greatest industry in the way that the gentleman has done. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two and a half minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks to proceed for two and a half minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] certainly was asleep while I made my statement. All of the meats that come from the farm were alluded to by the "gentleman from Illinois" as being wholesome, because they had smelt the smoke of the corncobs, the sassafras, and the hickory wood. [Applause.] It is the method which is known as "the quick method" of curing meats in this country and the long ages meats are kept in cold storage that I allude to as being unwholesome. I charge now that such methods are unwholesome and stand in need of the severest and most scrutinizing inspection.

I dare say if the gentleman has smelled the odor from the beef, the birds, and other meats coming from cold storage and has not been in the attitude of leaving the table to keep from holding his nose, he is the only man I know of who has not had such experience.

The gentleman talks about the meats of this country being wholesome in the packing house, and yet he stands here and asks for an appropriation of $200,000 to get a more efficient inspection of our meats. Ah, "consistency, thou art a jewel." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the gentleman from Nebraska never asked for $200,000 appropriation, and the gentleman from Illinois knows it. I have not been asleep. I admit that the gentleman's speeches are the greatest anesthetic known, surpassing ether and chloroform, but he did not put me to sleep this afternoon. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $1,969,696.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] just stated that when beefsteak was put on the table in his experience he had to hold his nose.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not eat any of it—no.

Mr. MANN. I am very glad to say that I do not find that experience at my boarding house. I think that the gentleman, instead of casting aspersion upon the meat of the country, to be sent out broadcast over the world, better change his boarding house. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question before he concludes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he knows that I am living at home in Washington [laughter], and that it might be unprofitable for me to leave my home?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman is living at home, for his statement that he is living at home is a refutation of his former statement that he had to hold his nose at the table.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that birds and meats are put on the table which are so nauseating that a man is loath to eat them and more anxious to hold his nose than to eat?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will put myself up as an object lesson, being fairly fat and eating well, dining out and in, at the boarding house and everywhere, as against my colleague from Illinois. I never found that experience. I regret that my friend from Illinois constantly goes to places where they give him something to eat which is not fit to eat. I do not have that experience.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to my colleague that on the train only a few months ago——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. FOWLER. That there was served——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry: One plant physiologist and pathologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,500; 1 executive assistant in seed distribution, $2,250; 1 officer in charge of publications, $2,200; 1 landscape gardener, $1,800; 1 officer in charge of records, $2,100; 1 superintendent of seed weighing and mailing, $2,000; 1 executive clerk, $2,250; 3 executive clerks, at $1,980 each; 1 assistant superintendent of seed warehouse, $1,400; 1 seed inspector, $1,000; 9 clerks, class 4; 11 clerks, class 3; 2 clerks, at $1,500 each; 17 clerks, class 2; 49 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,080; 9 clerks, at $1,020 each; 31 clerks, at $1,000 each; 51 clerks, at $900 each; 24 clerks, at $840 each; 15 clerks, at $720 each; 36 messengers, gardeners, or laborers, at $720 each; 11 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $660 each; 20 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 artist, $1,620; 1 clerk or artist, $1,200; 1 assistant in illustrations, $840; 1 photographer, $1,400; 1 photographer, $1,200; 1 photographer, $900; 1 laboratory aid, $1,440; 1 laboratory aid, $1,380; 3 laboratory aids, at $1,200 each; 1 laboratory aid, $1,080; 2 laboratory aids, at $1,020 each; 5 laboratory aids, at $840 each; 8 laboratory aids, at $720 each; 6 laboratory aids, at $600 each; 1 laboratory apprentice, $720; 2 map tracers, at $720 each; 1 map tracer, $600; 1 gardener, $1,440; 2 gardeners, at $1,200 each; 1 gardener, $1,100; 2 gardeners or assistants, at $1,000 each; 7 gardeners, at $900 each; 4 gardeners, at $840 each; 4 gardeners, at $780 each; 8 gardeners, at $720 each; 5 gardeners, at $660 each; 2 gardeners, at $600 each; 1 skilled laborer, $960; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 4 skilled laborers or gardeners, at $840 each; 1 assistant in technology, $1,400; 1 assistant in technology, $1,380; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,200; 1 blacksmith, $900; 1 carpenter, $900; 1 painter, $900; 1 teamster, $840; 1 teamster, $600; 19 laborers, at $540 each; 24 laborers, messengers, or messenger boys, at $480 each; 5 laborers or charwomen, at $480 each; 2 laborers or charwomen, at $360 each; 2 laborers, at $420 each; 8 charwomen, at $240 each; 8 messenger boys, at $360 each; 3 messenger bays, at $300 each; in all, $418,920.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee why it is that the salary of the chief of the bureau has been increased?

Mr. LAMB. Since when, does the gentleman mean? We did not increase any salaries.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the salary of the chief of that bureau was originally fixed at $3,000?

Mr. LAMB. I do not know. That is further back than I have gone.

Mr. FOWLER. And that the chief clerk's salary was fixed at $2,000?

Mr. LAMB. I do not know. The gentleman seems to have been looking into ancient history. Let us know.

Mr. FOWLER. I am asking for the reason for the increase.

Mr. LAMB. It is because we think the laborer is worthy of his hire.

Mr. FOWLER. Then why did you not increase the salaries of some of these laboring people who are getting as low as $360 a year?

Mr. LAMB. Last year we increased 158 of them.

Mr. FOWLER. And I see in the bill—in the paragraph—provision is made for laborers at $240 a year—charwomen.

Mr. LAMB. Well, they are charwomen who go there part of the day, just like charwomen in the office buildings. I presume the gentleman heard the discussion on the floor the other day with reference to that.

Mr. FOWLER. They told me they worked four or five hours a day. These women waited on me recently and told me they worked four or five hours a day.

Mr. EDWARDS. Which women are those?

Mr. FOWLER. The charwomen. Why did you increase the salaries of these big offices and fail to increase the little ones?

Mr. LAMB. Because of the difference in the work of a charwoman and the work of the chief of a division of the Department of Agriculture; for the same reason that the gentleman does not increase his employees at home in proportion to his salary here; because the gentleman is worth so much more than they are.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman is speaking from imagination, I assume.

Mr. LAMB. No; the fact is you are here and you are getting a $7,500 salary, whereas your man at home probably gets $25 a month.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman why he has increased the salary of the officer in charge of publications from $2,000 to $2,200?

Mr. LAMB. This is a promotion of $200 for an officer who handles all the publications of the bureau, prepares all manuscript for transmission to the Division of Publications, where they are officially revised before being sent to the Government Printer, and so forth. We could give a whole lot of reasons. He has not had a promotion in seven years.

Mr. FOWLER. I see the officer in charge of records has been increased from $2,000 to $2,100.

Mr. LAMB. This is an increase of $100 in the salary of this officer, who handles all financial matters of the bureau and who directs the handling of a sum aggregating over two and a quarter million dollars, and sees that 35 or 36 officers are regularly informed as to the status of their funds.

Mr. FOWLER. How many hours a day do these people put in?

Mr. LAMB. I suppose about eight or nine.

Mr. FOWLER. Do they not put in seven?

Mr. LAMB. Men like these, charged with the responsibility of this sort, work like Congressmen, until 7 or 8 o'clock at night.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask if it is not a fact they only put in about seven hours a day?

Mr. LAMB. It is not, I think.

Mr. FOWLER. Has the gentleman information upon this question?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; I have been there and seen them at all hours of the day. I spent a month down there once from early in the morning until dewy eve.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will not my colleague from Illinois take into consideration the fact that the volume of work turned out by this office has increased very largely on account of the increased demands of agriculture——

Mr. FOWLER. That is true.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Which annually puts more work under them? Now, the individual employee does not have to do any more work, but the manager or superintendent of this division, who must measure the energies and activities to meet the growth of it——

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman has read this paragraph, he must have seen the wonderful increase in the number of people who have been added to this great force for the purpose of meeting the increased demands on this department.

Mr. RODDENBERY. That is the very point I wanted to make to my colleague, that the superintendent of the division in charge of it has increased not only his responsibility and the details of the work which are a charge against——

Mr. FOWLER. He has subordinates to look after those.

Mr. RODDENBERY. That is quite true. I know my colleague knows that the superintendent here gives his personal supervision, and the more it increases the more he has to supervise both the subordinates and the employees. I merely wanted to impress upon my colleague that fact, because I know he is in earnest.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, in this Bureau of Plant Industry there are 500 projects, and the work of this department increases every year just to the proportion of the increase of population. They asked for an increase of $400,000 in this very bureau, and we carefully went over it and cut this item down to $200,000, and that is about the increase to this bureau. I think that the gentleman, who knows so much about ancient history and the cure of hams—and, by the way, if he comes down in Virginia we will show him exactly how to cure a Smithfield ham—might trust Dr. Galloway and the people in this bureau to a greater extent than he seems to do. I hope he will not make these captious objections. In any point of order upon any large matter here we will consider it patiently and hear him patiently; but if he will excuse me, it looks to me like this is frivolous to make these captious objections, as he has been making them. I hope he will excuse me for being earnest in this matter.

I do not waste time here. We want to get this bill through in the proper time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me just a moment?

Mr. FOWLER. I am willing to allow the following salaries to pass with the points of order I have mentioned pending, namely, the salary of the chief of bureau, the chief clerk, the officer in charge of publications, and the officer in charge of records. If any of these gentlemen are not satisfied that there are increases in these salaries——

Mr. LAMB. You make a point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I say I desire to pass it and let the point of order be pending until to-morrow morning, in order to give you an opportunity to make the examination.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that I have not been able, so far as I have examined into the statutes, to find that there is any law anywhere fixing the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has that, and the salary has been fixed by law, then of course it is necessarily subject to a point of order, and the gentleman might as well make it. We will concede it, and will go on attending to business here.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will my colleague yield, inasmuch as he has reserved a point of order in this connection?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do not quite agree with the distinguished chairman of the committee that even this objection would be a captious objection if my colleague would make it, nor do I think he is given to making trivial and captious objections. I think it is a question that should be discussed and resolved on its merits. What I want to address to the attention of my colleague is a statement made a few moments ago that the heads of the subordinates here are increased; that the actual clerical force is increased; and he knows that the demands of our correspondence from our constituents, which goes into this department, is increased on all lines. Our country is growing. When we send these requests down we want them attended to accurately and properly, and with immediate dispatch. It is very important to have at the head of a department of this character men of capacity and qualifications for that purpose, and if we do have them, I want to suggest to my colleague that this increase, if an increase it is, is a very moderate one, and if you take the aggregate of the compensation, it is entirely reasonable for men of that capacity and ability.

Mr. LAMB. Let me answer right there, in reply to the suggestion made, that the increase in this Bureau of Plant Industry is only $1,600.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] did not understand me to raise a criticism that my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] was making captious suggestions. I made no such statement, nor have I intended to do it. The gentleman, of course, has a perfect right to make these objections. But I want to say that this Bureau of Plant Industry is the only bureau that devotes its entire attention to the agriculture of the country. It is conducting scientific research work relative to crop growing; it is conducting farm demonstration work in the South and farm demonstration work in the North. It is doing the greatest work, in my judgment, of any bureau in the Department of Agriculture or of any bureau in the Government service. There is not a more competent man anywhere, there is not a man who gives closer attention to the service, there is not a man who is more efficient in the service, than Dr. Galloway, the man at the head of this bureau. And I do hope my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] will not make a point of order against these men. Dr. Galloway has been drawing this salary of $5,000 for a number of years. Of these few men whose salaries we have increased one or two hundred dollars a year one has not had an increase of salary for seven years and one has not had an increase for four or five years, and we can not keep our best men in these lines of technical and scientific work unless we are willing to give them a reasonable salary. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the man who acted as temporary Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, Dr. Powell, a few years ago left the department and went to California and entered another work at a salary of $12,000 a year. A lot of these men at the head of these bureaus are really working at a sacrifice to themselves and their families. I hope my friend will not press this point.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment, please.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEVER. The regular order is a decision on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not know that the unanimous-consent request had been made at all. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] make his point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph may be passed with the points of order pending against the three salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. MANN] has just asked for the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the regular order is the deciding of the point of order. Is that right?

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] either to make the point of order or withdraw it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I submit once more for unanimous consent that the paragraph may be passed with the points of order pending against the four salaries mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks that his request for unanimous consent be again presented.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to say that we have been all day upon this bill and are now upon page 13. There are 64 pages to this bill, and unless we settle something as we go on there is no possibility of passing the appropriation bills at this session except under suspension of the rules, if it can be done in that way. Therefore I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] make the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman before him the statute limiting the salary to $3,500?

Mr. FOWLER. I have not the statute before me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman certain that that is the statute at the present time?

Mr. FOWLER. I have made a thorough examination of the statutes and I am of the opinion, from the information I can get, that the salary was originally fixed at $2,000, and then carried by increases in appropriation bills. That was the reason, Mr. Chairman, why I was willing to let it pass, so that there might be a certainty. I do not desire to press the point of order unless the statute justifies it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is through, I desire to submit to the Chair that I have read a digest of the laws applicable to the Department of Agriculture, prepared by the solicitor of the department some years ago, and I have failed to find where the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry is fixed by any statute whatever. The Bureau of Plant Industry differs from the Weather Bureau or from the Bureau of Animal Industry, in that the Bureau of Plant Industry has been created upon an appropriation bill and not by any statute setting out its limitations or fixing the salary.

Mr. FOWLER. I have indicated to the Chair my best information concerning the matter, that the statute first enacted upon this subject, fixing the salary, was in 1862, as I recollect, and that subsequently there have been some amendments made thereto; but the salary as to this first office was fixed at $2,000. That is my best information.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] will state that he knows as a matter of fact that the salary of this chief of bureau is fixed by law at a sum different from that which is carried in this bill, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I can not do that, Mr. Chairman, because I desire to be fair.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair overrules the point of order, on the assumption that the amount carried in the appropriation bill is authorized by law.

Mr. FOWLER. That is, for the chief of the bureau?

The CHAIRMAN. For the chief of the bureau.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, the chief clerk will be in the same condition, Mr. Chairman, as the chief of the bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman any definite information on that?

Mr. FOWLER. Only, as I say, I have read the statute upon this question fixing the salary, and my recollection is that when it first came in it was fixed at $2,000, although I do not desire at all to say to the Chair that I am positive about the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of a positive statement from some Member that the salary provided in this bill is different from the salary provided by law, the Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, nearly all of these divisions in the Agricultural Department were provided, as they now are, in the agricultural appropriation bill a few years ago, since I have been a Member of the House. The only fixing of salaries, as I recall it, was by making the appropriation. I do not think there is any law outside of the appropriation bill except the organic law of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. There is an organic law of 1862, fixing the salaries of a number of officers and public places in this department.

The other item to which I make the point of order is the salary of the officer in charge of publications, $2,200, an increase of $200.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. One officer in charge of records, in line 7, page 13, increased from $2,000 to $2,100.

The CHAIRMAN. An increase of $100 above the last appropriation bill?

Mr. FOWLER. The Chair sustains the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. As the bill now stands, do the words in lines 5 and 6, "one officer in charge of publications," remain in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The salary is stricken out.

Mr. MANN. There is a blank there now?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, I would leave it blank.

Mr. LAMB. I will ask the Clerk to insert the old amount, $2,000, in line 6, page 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that the Clerk can not do that. It requires an amendment by the committee to make that change.

Mr. LAMB. Then I offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 6, at the beginning of the line, insert "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. And in line 7, page 13, I move to insert "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of plant diseases and pathological collections, $25,000.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 15, line 12, after the word "diseases," by inserting "including diseases of ginseng," and in line 13, strike out "$25,000" and insert "$30,000," so that the paragraph will read:

"For investigations of plant diseases, including ginseng, and pathological collections, $30,000."

Mr. LEVER. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment at the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], who was not able to remain here. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] is very much interested in this subject. He has investigated it carefully and is of the opinion that the money is necessary. Diseases of the ginseng have developed, and the growers of it have not been able to deal with them. They feel that they need help, and they ask for this modest, moderate appropriation of $5,000.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. This paragraph is for investigations of plant diseases?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is ginseng a plant?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. No doubt it is.

Mr. CANNON. Then what is the use of the amendment?

Mr. MANN. It carries an appropriation of an additional $5,000.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There is an additional appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. I did not hear that part of it.

Mr. LEVER. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I wonder if my colleague knows that the Department of Agriculture on April 30, 1912, issued a bulletin of 44 pages on the Diseases of the Ginseng and Their Control, which pamphlet I hold in my hand?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I did not know about that.

Mr. LAMB. I have a letter from the Secretary touching that very matter, saying substantially that they are doing this work now.

Mr. MANN. I have read the bulletin issued by the Agricultural Department on ginseng and another one formerly issued by the department. The gentleman from Wisconsin, on whose behalf the amendment is offered, raises ginseng and is very familiar with the trade in this country. Ginseng is a plant that grows here and is exported to China as a sort of medicine. The plant is subject to diseases. The gentleman from Wisconsin knows the subject thoroughly and has given a great deal of attention to it. This plant is attacked by diseases which ought to be investigated by the department. The gentleman from Wisconsin has been a Member of this House for a long time. During the last session of Congress he worked day and night for months in connection with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], going over the reports and the findings of the Court of Claims on these war-claims propositions, and on his statement and the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee the House passed the war-claims bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin after doing all this work is now about to retire from Congress. He knows the subject of ginseng, and I think we can afford to take his judgment for $5,000 on this proposition when this side of the House has taken it on a million dollars of war claims.

Mr. SIMS. Over a million and a half dollars. And while I am on my feet I want to ask if there is any more profitable thing grown in this country, if it can be protected against disease, than ginseng? It is worth $6 a pound, and when I used to dig it as a boy I sold it for 30 and 40 cents a pound.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will pardon me, there is now available for the study of plants $25,000, and it is moved to increase the amount by $5,000.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of the amendment is to give the department an opportunity, if it will, to use all or a part of the $5,000 by increasing the amount for the investigation of ginseng. The department is not now engaged in the study of the subject of ginseng by actual experiment.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask my colleague could any or all of this $5,000, under the law, be used for the employment of any person?

Mr. MANN. I suppose that is what it will be used for; that is the way they will study it; they will have somebody go out where they are raising it and study these diseases.

Mr. CANNON. And this $5,000, neither in whole nor in part, is contemplated for the employment of our colleague?

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. I am glad my colleague asked that question; but there will be no large salaries paid out of it. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not looking for and is not to have the job.

Mr. CANNON. I am very glad the gentleman said that, because of the very valuable services rendered by the gentleman in connection with the gentleman from Tennessee an evil-minded person might gather that this was to be given to him.

Mr. MANN. I suppose some one might have inferred it from my remarks, but that is not the case.

Mr. LAMB. I think the Government has given some attention to this, but with the great reverence I have for the minority I am willing to yield to the request.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say that there was an experiment made in raising ginseng right close to my own home. The gentleman cleared the land, put in the ginseng, and it did well for two or three years, and then through some insect or some disease it was entirely destroyed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the physiology of crop plants and for testing and breeding varieties thereof, $30,380.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that this appropriation is the same as it was last year, and yet the department in its estimate asked for $6,200 additional, and gave as a reason that they wanted to enlarge the scope of investigations of dates and figs and work on cotton with the Indians. I made some remarks this morning in regard to the Egyptian cotton industry and that language caught my eye. If anything can be done to assist the Indians in the cultivation of a high grade of long-staple cotton, I think the additional money would be well expended. Figs and dates can be grown in Arizona and California, and I am of the opinion that the cultivation of such fruits ought to be encouraged.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman seems to know what the chief of the bureau said and that is all I know about it.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the committee declined to give the increase. It seems to me that this work has great merit.

Mr. LAMB. We had to trim down some of these estimates; we could not give everything they asked.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of cotton by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, $33,300.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the same reason that I did before. In the estimates the department has asked for $10,000 additional, giving as a reason that they desire to properly carry out important work which has been inaugurated in the improvement of cotton and the development of community work in cotton growing, and that this is of vital importance to the cotton interests of the South.

Mr. LAMB. We think that we have given them enough.

Mr. HAYDEN. The committee allowed the same amount as last year.

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For studying and testing commercial seeds, including the testing of samples of seeds of grasses, clover, or alfalfa secured in the open market, and where such samples are found to be adulterated or misbranded the results of the tests shall be published, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale, $26,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 18, at the beginning of the line, insert the words "and lawn-grass seed."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman object to adding to his amendment "and Bermuda"?

Mr. MANN. Bermuda is already covered by the bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does not "seeds of grasses" cover lawn seed also?

Mr. MANN. Lawn seed is the proper term, although I have made it lawn-grass seed. It is usually a mixture of seed. A lot of seed houses have gotten into the habit of mixing seed containing mainly the seed of weeds. I want them to feel that if they continue that they are in danger of having their names published. I want the practice stopped.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production, and the study of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, $104,925.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, after line 26, add the following:
"Provided, That not less than $30,000 shall be set aside for the study of corn improvement and methods of corn production."

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this amendment is agreeable to the committee. If so, I will not take up the time of the House in discussing it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, speaking for the committee, I will say that the amendment is agreeable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, and for farm demonstration work, $375,000: Provided, That of the amount hereby appropriated the sum of $8,800 may be used in the investigation and utilization of cacti and other dry-land plants as food for stock.

[Mr. LEVER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations in connection with western irrigation agriculture, the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act, and other areas in the arid and semiarid regions, $73,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in this case that the committee did not allow the amount asked for by the department, and in reading the justification in the Book of Estimates it says that they need this extra money, some $3,000, on account of the extension of important work on cotton production in the Southwest, especially Egyptian cotton. The committee did not feel they could possibly allow what the department wanted for this particular work?

Mr. LAMB. We thought they could get on with what they had.

Mr. HAYDEN. And allowed the amount they had last year?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of fruits, and the methods of fruit growing, harvesting, packing, storing, handling, and shipping, and for experimental shipments of fruits within the United States and to foreign countries, $92,000.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, at the end of line 17, on page 18, after "$92,000," by adding the following: "Provided, That $5,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be set aside and used in the investigation and improvement of the pecan industry."

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am in hopes that the committee will agree to this amendment. The Government has done very little toward the encouragement of the pecan industry in this country. In my section it is an industry that is growing very rapidly. It was not until recently, if at all, that the Government issued a bulletin with respect to the pecan industry.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; many years ago.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I have been unable to find it on the list. I have had several calls for it, and you can not get it. I know that recently there was in the course of preparation a bulletin on the pecan industry, but I do not think it has as yet been issued.

Mr. MANN. They issued a very handsome book on the pecan industry.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. It has not been my good fortune to see that.

Mr. MANN. I expect it is out of print.

Mr. LAMB. Why did not the gentleman ask the department about this?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I called up the department; Mr. Galloway was not there, and I talked with Mr. Jones, his assistant. He said some work had been done along this line, but he did not think very much. I am not asking by this amendment any additional amount of money. I am asking that only a small part of this total appropriation be used for this purpose—$5,000. I have had several letters with reference to this, and the people in our section are very much interested in it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the Chairman will permit—I do not know but what it might throw light on the subject—the Government is engaged, and has been, I know personally, for over three years, in sending out agents for the investigation of the diseases of the pecan; I do not know what appropriation it comes under, but looking to the proper treatment of the disease of blight and worm in the pecan, and so forth.

For more than three years they have been doing that, and have been inspecting orchards all through the pecan belt to ascertain what fruit turned out the best, which was bearing the best, and so forth. This has come under my personal observation, and the bulletin the gentleman [Mr. HARRISON] refers to, when it is published, I know from personal observation, with the information they are acquiring it will not be conjecture, but it will be a statement of actual facts.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Has that bulletin been published yet?

Mr. RODDENBERY. It has not, but I think it is in press, or in course of preparation.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the Government, in my opinion, has not gone into this subject as much as the growth of the industry demands, and I think they should be allowed to go into it more fully. Now, as to whether there is sufficient appropriation or whether it comes out of this item I can not say.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? Is the gentleman aware this item is expended in the matter of shipping fruit?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I called up the department and asked under which of these paragraphs would this item come, and they told me this would be the paragraph under which the pecan industry would come.

Mr. MANN. I think it has in the past mainly been used in connection with the packing and shipping of citrus fruits and apples not only in this country but abroad. I do not think it would have anything to do, in the main, with growing pecans.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Under this amendment there would be no question about it, because it says that $5,000 of the amount may be used for the purpose of investigating and improving the pecan industry.

Mr. CANDLER. This amendment only provides that the department may have discretion in this matter, and this industry is growing in importance. I have recently had inquiries in reference to it from our section of the country myself, and other sections of the United States. This is a matter the department can well investigate, and they can use this amount if they see fit to do so, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $296,000, of which amount not less than $257,000 shall be allotted for congressional distribution. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon such envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided further, That $30,000 of which sum, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used for the purchase and distribution of drought-resistant field seeds through the Great Plains area and other dry-land sections of the United States.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph beginning on line 22, page 19, down to and including line 17, on page 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph beginning on line 22, page 19, down to and including line 17, on page 22.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, on that I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COX. Wait a minute, Mr. Chairman. I will say to the chairman now that we will not conclude this paragraph this evening, because I am not going to let a vote go on this unless a quorum is present.

Mr. LAMB. Before the gentleman does that, I ask permission to turn to page 21, line 10, and strike out the word "such" and insert the word "each."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 10, strike out the word "such" and insert in lieu thereof the word "each."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

They are so horrible that they might seem incredible were their existence supported by less trustworthy evidence.'"

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 8, 1913.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, as we stand before Thee on this day of precious memory we thank Thee that life is not so short that we can not for a time lay aside our customary labors and yield ourselves to the tender and holy influences of this hour. As here we stand in Thy presence, we would take the shoes from off our feet, knowing that where Thy servants have faithfully and truly sought to do Thy will there indeed is holy ground Here manifest Thyself unto our waiting spirits, we pray Thee, and fulfill unto us Thy promise that where Thy children are gathered together in Thy name there Thou wilt be in their midst.

O Thou who art God, not of the dead but of the living, seeing that all souls live unto Thee, we thank Thee, not as we would but as we are able, for the blessed privilege of having known and labored with him whom we this day commemorate. Inspire our hearts, quicken our memories, and direct our thoughts, that the life which we would now honor may stand before us with all its power and in all its beauty. That life was Thine, our Father, and Thine it is. We yield Thee all praise, O Holy One, for the priceless heritage of the memory of him whose life is now hid with Christ in Thee.

We pray Thee to be near to those to whom this life was most dear and to comfort those whose tender sorrow is too great for words and too deep for tears. Uphold them with Thy heavenly power and let Thy grace be sufficient for them until we, too, stand in Thy nearer presence, where we shall know even as we have been known.

And unto Thee, our God, who hast loved us with an everlasting love and hast called us into Thine eternal kingdom in Christ, unto Thee who hast given us eternal comfort and good hope through the Gospel, be all glory and praise on earth and in heaven, now and forevermore. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

Joint resolution and memorial requesting the Congress of the United States to make Fort Meade, S. Dak., a brigade post, with permanent brick or stone barracks, officers' quarters, and other buildings.

Be it resolved by the Senate of South Dakota (the House concurring):

SECTION 1—

Whereas Fort Meade is centrally located with reference to all Indian reservations in North and South Dakota, Montana, and Wyoming upon which there are quartered about 40,000 Indians; and

Whereas Fort Meade is the only military post in South Dakota, and the only post in the whole Northwest possessing the required strategic advantages to exercise surveillance over the Indians and afford proper protection to the property and people of this rich and rapidly developing country; and

Whereas the lines of railroad now in operation offer transportation facilities over four lines in four different directions, forming a basis for military movements, enabling troops to quickly reach any point of trouble; and

Whereas Fort Meade has a larger timber reservation, with the Black Hills Forest Reserve, where there is pine timber and an abundant supply of mountain spring water and also a military reservation, 2 miles by 6 miles in area, containing 21,000 acres, with all available adjoining land needed for the requirements of a brigade post, which collectively would include the rolling prairie, open and wooded streams of water, bluffs and brakes, bare hills and timbered mountains, offering all practicable varieties of country for maneuvers; and

Whereas the hospital records show that the pure, malaria-free, bracing climate renders Fort Meade the healthiest post garrisoned in America; and

Whereas Fort Meade has been built as a two-squadron Cavalry post, there having been built in the past six years brick and stone barracks for eight troops, hospital, post exchange, line and field officers' quarters, noncommissioned officers' quarters, bakery, powder magazine, stables, fire station, water system and concrete reservoir, sewer drain and stable drain, macadamized roads and cement walks, electric-light wiring, and other permanent improvements modern and up to date, costing over $600,000: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we favor and earnestly urge the Congress of the United States by proper enactment to designate Fore Meade as a brigade post and provide for the erection of additional barracks, quarters, and other structures ample and suitable for the proper garrison thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That we request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to employ their best efforts to compass this end.

MINOR MERIWETHER, JR.

Mr. PERKINS. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 8348) waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Minor Meriwether, jr., and I submit a report (No. 1200) thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] to the bill.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It has the cordial approval of the department. A report accompanies it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from California.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy be, and it is hereby, waived in the case of Minor Meriwether, jr., in consideration of his previous naval service.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana how many years are waived in this particular case?

Mr. THORNTON. I would answer the Senator by saying that there is a full report from the department in connection with the matter. I will ask the Secretary to read the report of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Could the Senator state even approximately how many years? I do not care to take the time to have the report read.

Mr. THORNTON. I think about six years, perhaps.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the department recommends it?

Mr. THORNTON. Yes, sir; urgently.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have had a little experience in trying to get a waiver in cases somewhat similar, but I have not had very good success. However, I do not object.

Mr. THORNTON. I would not have asked for the passage of the bill unless the department had recommended it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report submitted by Mr. PERKINS was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany bill S. 8348:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 8348) waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Minor Meriwether, jr., having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill has the approval of the Navy Department, as will appear by the following communication:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, February 7, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Replying to the letter from your committee transmitting a bill (S. 8348) waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Minor Meriwether, jr., I have the honor to inform you that the department recommends favorable action upon this measure.

This bill (S. 8348) is identical with a House bill (H. R. 28535) in its provisions. In regard to the latter bill, the Bureau of Navigation of this department, which has general supervision of the personnel of the Navy, reported as follows:

"Minor Meriwether, jr., was born January 6, 1886, and is at present one year and two months over the maximum age limit for appointees to the Pay Corps of the Navy. He was appointed a midshipman in the Navy May 10, 1904, but did not complete the course, offering his resignation after two years, which was accepted March 29, 1906. His record there would warrant his being accepted for further service as an officer in the Navy."

In view of his having had two years' naval training, and not being long over age, the bureau recommends the department's approval of the bill (H. R. 28535).

Faithfully, yours, GEO. VON L. MEYER.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, out of respect to the memory of my late colleague, Hon. ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON). The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Tennessee will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 457) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR was born on July 31, 1850, at Happy Valley, in Carter County, Tenn. He was a son of Nathaniel G. Taylor, a Member of Congress from Tennessee and Commissioner of Indian Affairs. His mother, Emily Haynes, was a sister of Landon C. Haynes, a Senator in the Confederate Congress. He claimed public life and statecraft as a common inheritance, and in the enjoyment of this legacy represented the people of Tennessee in the House of Representatives, three times as governor of the State, and for nearly one term as Senator of the United States.

Tennessee has had many representatives and executives who have served her people as faithfully and as intelligently as did BOB TAYLOR, but none who were more free even from a suspicion of wrongdoing or the breath of scandal, or whose heart beat in keener sympathy with the humble and lowly of humanity.

It is not the purpose of these remarks to comment upon Senator TAYLOR'S life and career as a public official. His splendid record as three times governor of Tennessee is already a part of the history of that proud Commonwealth. His distinguished services in the House of Representatives and in this body are embodied in the permanent record of achievement of our country.

In passing, let it be remembered that no critic, however harsh or unfriendly, can point to any act of BOB TAYLOR'S, as a Member of either House of Congress or as governor, that was ever dictated save by what he believed to be the best interests of the people he represented and loved.

His life was well worth the living; his death a loss. His mission on earth was to inspire smiles that would dry the tears on the faces of the disappointed, to quicken laughter that would stifle the sobs of the distressed, to brighten the way of those who were groping in darkness, to light the beacons of hope to those despairing.

Office and public service were but the vehicles in which he traveled along life's highways, spreading sunshine and dispelling gloom as he performed deeds that were unequaled in bestowing happiness upon all who were fortunate enough to come in contact with his great, loving, and much-beloved heart.

He was coming into possession of this rare and wondrous power at a time when the South, his native land, was harrowed by sorrow, when mourning marked her homes, when scars served as medals for her heroes, when hunger and want taught her children the lesson of self-denial, when patience and suffering were the only jewels that adorned her womanhood. In his blood mingled the humanitarianism of the triumphant Unionists and the loyalty of the proud but defeated Secessionists, blending in him a perfect sympathy and understanding of mankind, and forming a character whose ambition was to heal where others wounded, to soothe where others pained, to substitute love for hatred, to place happiness upon the brow of despair, and to give a greater measure of contentment to all.

The general wins eternal fame by defending his own country or invading an enemy's, but the price of his renown is bloodshed and death, suffering and pain, ruin and want to as many thousands as, benefited by his success, applaud his achievements.

The conquest of the statesman in the public forum is marred by the disappointed ambition of the antagonist, the extent of whose discomfiture measures the greatness of his successful rival's triumph.

These victories are but meager and fleeting, often the result of accident and chance; while the triumphs of ameliorating the woes of humanity and of adding to the sum total of happiness is immortal and vouchsafed to only a few as it was given to BOB TAYLOR.

ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR, publicist, lecturer, and statesman was born, lived, and died in Happy Valley, for he ever lived in valleys whose harvests were happiness for all who, passing out of the shadows of selfishness into the warm rays of his great, generous heart, reaped where he had sown.

He was a soldier whose musket was loaded only with raillery, the keenness of whose sword was only laughter, whose bayonet stabbed naught but gloom; a soldier whose only charges were against despair, who slew only unhappiness, and whose greatest victory was the siege and capture of the heart of humanity.

When he shall die,
Take him and cut him out in little stars,
And he will make the face of heaven so fine
That all the world will be in love with night
And pay no worship to the garish sun.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to conclude my remarks with a tribute which was paid to the late Senator TAYLOR by his lifelong friend, Mr. De Long Rice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The tribute referred to is as follows:

A TRIBUTE BY HON. DE LONG RICE, OF NASHVILLE, TENN., A LIFELONG FRIEND, ASSOCIATE, AND ADMIRER OF THE LATE SENATOR ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR.

"Sweet as honey flowed his stream of speech.

"For 20 years ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR was the most successful lecturer on the American platform. If all of his audiences could be gathered together they would make a multitude of millions of people.

"This estimate includes the tour in 1895–96 with his brother, Hon. Alfred A. Taylor, in their joint lecture, 'Yankee Doodle and Dixie,' which, in its splendid balance and reciprocal beauty, was one of the most unique and sensationally successful attractions ever presented in America. Differing widely in manner and style, each served as a foil to develop the brilliancy of the other.

"A careful estimate shows the gross earnings of Senator TAYLOR's lectures to have run far into the hundreds of thousands of dollars—a sum which, had he hoarded and invested it, might have easily made him a millionaire. But BOB TAYLOR's riches were of the soul.

"You ask: What became of his money? It went through the sieve of his great generous heart for the happiness of those he loved, for the betterment of mankind, and the advancement of civilization. Some of it has crossed the oceans to spread the light of religion; some of it is crooning above the cradles of orphan asylums; some of it is ministering to the sick in hospitals; some of it is built into the walls of libraries; much of it is standing in bronze and marble grace throughout the South to perpetuate the glory of the Confederate soldier, and still more of it is pointing toward heaven in the gleaming spires of churches; not one dollar of it was spent to serve a sordid purpose.

"No more appropriate epitaph could be carved upon the tomb of ROBERT L. TAYLOR than this: 'He loved everybody and everything except money.'

"That he was an extraordinary man is a fact which will pass into history. As the viewpoints of those who knew him differ, so will their opinions differ as to the extent of his greatness and the fineness of his genius. In the effort to correctly focus the eyes of the future upon him, truth must inevitably wrangle with error, and though truth shall prevail, the written page can never do him justice; no analysis can clearly define him. Not even a Shakespeare or a Milton can paint the flavor of a peach or picture the odor of a rose. Poets may sing forever of moonlit rivers, but unless you have looked upon their shimmering silver flowing through hours that belong to dreams you are a stranger to their beauty.

"Only those who have seen and heard BOB TAYLOR can enjoy anything approaching a true conception of the man. Like all remarkable men, he followed no guide and walked no beaten road. His success mocked all precedents and defied all rules. Though he occupied for 30 years the throne of fame, his severest dignity was the simplicity of his nature, and love was the sword of his strength. His perennial humor was only the tinsel draping of his power like the sun-embroidered shawl of mist that wraps Niagara's mighty shoulders.

"This man of marvelous personality was a veritable human magnet. Wherever he chose to cast the zone of his influence the multitudes were drawn to him by the unseen chords of his fascination. An incomparable stump speaker, a brilliant young Congressman, a splendid governor, he nevertheless soared above these accomplishments and left them far below, for it was on the lecture platform that he found the true destiny of his talents and reached the noon of his glory.

"It was in October of 1891 that he determined to leave the harbor of political achievement and set forth on a strange sea. Contemplating its inhospitable waters, he gathered no assurance of certain success, for he remembered that beneath its treacherous tides were the sunken hopes of many a statesman. But with the buoyant heart of an adventurous mariner he prepared for the first voyage. He built a ship of wondrous beauty and christened her 'The Fiddle and the Bow.' His foreman was inspiration and the muses were his carpenters. Softly moved their invisible planes and saws and silently fell their hammers of fancy. The master whose mind conceived this phantom craft wrought with dubious care, for he knew that she must travel the dead waters of indifference, breast the green waves of envy, and meet the fierce tempests of criticism. Her timbers were as light as the foam of a fairy ocean, and her frame was shaped to the grace of a swan. Her rigging was roped with moonbeams and her sails were set to catch the winds from a thousand islands of laughter and song. She flew the flag of universal love. Her gunners were cupids, and her guns were cupid's bows. On her deck of sentiment skipped and strolled the spirit of mirth and the soul of pathos, while o'er her keel was spilled the mellow wine of long ago.

"'The Fiddle and the Bow' was launched in the cold gloom of a December evening in 1891, and when she sailed back home amid the melting ice of March she was blazoned with victory and freighted with gold.

"BOB TAYLOR's other ships that were launched in the years that followed were masterpieces. All were the bearers of visions as voluptuous and fair as e'er floated in the festivals of Cleopatra above the dozy currents of the Nile; all returned with cargoes of wealth to their builder, and all are monuments to his memory; but no vessel ever sailed from the port of his dreams which so completely explored and conquered the vast deep of human emotions as did the first-born of his genius.

"Having glanced at BOB TAYLOR's successful advent into the lyceum world, and having briefly studied, by suggestion and allegory, the mold and fiber of his first lecture, let us consider for a moment the temper of the public toward lecturers and the difficulties which confront them.

"The purely educational lecture is the one which was originally intended for the platform, but at the time the lyceum idea began to assert itself in the United States that class of lecture was far more of a necessity than it is to-day. This is the age of printed literature. Because a man can pursue the classics at his own fireside and learn from the periodicals of the day the most advanced theories on all current questions he finds it less necessary and less desirable to spend his money for instructions from the platform.

"But still less attractive is the lecture which lives only from lips to ear and dies within the hour of its delivery, which leaves no lesson, imparts no knowledge, and gives no stimulus to the nobility of our natures. It is the strong drink of the platform which buoys us into the garden of false fancy for an instant and then leaves us in dullness and remorse when its temporary effect has flown.

"Behold the two dangers of the platformist! Unsweetened facts and unilluminated figures on the one hand and superficial nonsense on the other. Happy is the man, and rare indeed, who can steer his course clear and true between the deadly Scylla of statistical dry dust and the fatal Charybdis of verbal froth. 'Tis in this narrow, though bright and sunny, strait that the jewel of success is found.

"He who would win must be able to interest and fascinate while giving delightful and substantial nourishment to the intellect. He must know how to gem the dullest fact with pleasing luster and point the most frivolous joke with lofty purpose. To be a savant is not sufficient. Scholarly attainments are only his raw materials. Though there be folded within his brain the countless pages of a Carnegie library, the voice of his knowledge may rasp the air with discord and the words of his learning may fall from a tuneless tongue. And even with scholarship and the music of speech he may fail without that other and greatest essential—that quality which in our ignorance we sometimes call individuality, sometimes magnetism, sometimes personality, always genius. Wherever we meet it we bow before its scepter, but when we seek to comprehend it it flees from us like the wraith of a myth. It is as evasive, as intangible, and indescribable as the power of electricity which holds the universe in its unseen clutch. It sometimes shows itself in a glance of the eye or flits before us on the wings of a smile. Unapproachable as a spirit, it is the divine bower of an immortal; it is the copyright of a soul.

"It is this bewitching force that weaves the laurels and molds the crowns of history. It was this mysterious power, softened with love and seasoned with humor, which made BOB TAYLOR king of the American platform for 20 years.

"It seems but an hour since the sun of his life went down. While yet we linger in the twilight of recollection, before the night of forgetfulness blurs the picture of memory, let us, in imagination, look at him again. We will erect a great auditorium in the realm of the mind, people it with the phantom forms of those who loved him, and encore him from the silence of death to speak to us once more.

"There he is in the dressing room impatiently waiting to begin, absent-minded, and uncommunicative to those who have the bad judgment to persist in talking to him while he is massing his faculties for his effort. The glow of intense interest is in his face. He is a general preparing to send his troops to victory. Observing him, a man near by asks if his lecture is to be extemporaneous. Oh, foolish question! It would be as sensible to ask if Napoelon manufactured powder on the thundering field of Marengo or molded cannon balls amid the roaring guns of Austerlitz.

"Now the curtain rises on fluttering fans and radiant faces, the eager expectants of a joyous hour. The droning murmur of the multitude is hushed and many a conversation dies on the lips of whispering lovers. This is the most dangerous moment that comes to the speaker, and the keen sense of our orator feels it. He learns, with a look of satisfaction, that the useless introductory speech is to be omitted and that he is to appear unannounced. He does not slouch to the front with that unembarrassed awkwardness and insolent brass so common among successful speakers. Straightening himself to his full height with a quick and springing grace, he advances to the footlights with military precision of step. A gentle wave of applause rolls through the audience, but he gives it no acknowledgment. He does not smile; he does not bow; only stands still and waits for quiet. In the extreme straightness of his posture he appears to lean back a little above the waistline. His face is slightly uplifted and his left hand is raised to rest lightly over his heart. Though perfectly calm, he is not careless. Every nerve of concentration is on duty. He does not persecute us with a prelude or bore us with a preamble. The music of his discourse starts with his first word, and his opening sentence thrills us as when a master sweeps the strings of his harp in the full flow of its melody. He is no solemn-browed teacher, vexing us with major premise and minor premise and assailing us with logical conclusions. Such matters are left to Socrates and Plato and Aristotle, the crystal fountains of philosophy. He is telling us of things we already know, though we have never known them as we see them now. He opens the doors of an endless picture gallery, and when we step into its enchanted halls, lo, it is only the old familiar earth through which we have walked with unseeing eyes. Yonder, where we have looked upon ragged cliffs and crags, he shows us the towering mountains subdued and toned in their gigantic grandeur by the poetic haze of Indian summer. The hills up which we have toiled and the valleys where we have labored are all adorned with new-found charms. We learn that the gold of harvest fields is more than a promise of biscuits and pies, and that the foaming beauty of cascade and cataract will quench the thirst of our souls.

"Lashing us to the pinions of his mind, he leaves the picture gallery of earth and soars aloft to where worlds are born, reveals our weakness, and unveils the power of God in the light of wheeling suns.

"Now, on the easy wings of his daring art, he descends from boundless tracts of stars to a thicket of jabbering apes, and sings a simian love song under a coconut tree.

"Fresh from zones of comets and astral climes, we are convulsed with laughter. He smiles at us while waiting for the storm of mirth to pass, and then leads us back to the happy land of childhood, becomes a boy himself, reacts the reckless deeds of barefoot days, and convicts us of forgotten crimes, besieges forbidden orchards, and throws headlong courage against the red-hot bayonets of charging hornets. He plunders pantries and loots cupboards, and while we laugh and laugh again he wipes his cherry-stained lips upon his ragged sleeve.

"Deftly he closes the gates of the realm of yesterday and the eyes of merriment are dimmed with tears.

"Ere we are aware of it he wafts us into a new kingdom, where every melodious sound is the fragment of an anthem. In the deep forest, cool with shadows and morning dew, he coaxes from the golden throats of wild birds the sweet concord of bands and chords; and where the dusk of evening falls on meadow and grove and stream he marshals the voices of the night in grand rehearsal. With master baton he conducts a chorus of crickets and katydids, of beetles and bullfrogs, and all the countless creatures of chirping throats and whirring wings.

"The end of the lecture is near; he leaves the scenes of grandeur and of levity, takes us into the purple chamber of his heart, and talks to us of the intimate things of life; divines with eyes of love the dimpling dreams of little babes, and counts the striped marbles of our children, hallows the faces of father and mother, and consecrates the home. Eighty minutes have swiftly flown while he has swept the keys and chords of human sentiment. Applause is clamoring for more, but his finishing note has been struck. He bows and walks rapidly off the stage and the curtain falls, while laughter sighs and pathos smiles.

"Oh, unique character among men. We salute thee ere we say farewell. No mind could soar in beauty's skies with freer flight. Who but thee could drop with grace from flying planets to grimacing monkeys? Who but thee could hold us spellbound with discourse on such little things as beetles and frogs and butterflies? Only Shakespeare in all the pages of literature; and in this particular art thou didst outdo him, for in the endless scale of thy matchless voice were all the mimic sounds of forest and field and flowing waters, and thou couldst glorify or distort thy noble face to impersonate whatsoever thou wouldst. In thee speechless nature found a voice and thou didst become the tongue of dumb beauty. Thy like shall not appear; the centuries shall sigh in vain for thy duplicate. Would that we could hold and fix thee here in the fullness of thy wonted power as a lasting legacy to millions yet to be; but barren is our wish, for while broken-hearted music sobbed in sacred song above thy open grave, we saw all that earth can claim of thee sink to everlasting rest beneath sheaves and shocks of roses."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it was fitting that there should come out of Happy Valley, in the Volunteer State, one whose life would furnish an example of sincere worship of God, service to his fellow man, and to his country.

It was fitting, too, that this life should be so spent that he who lived it should deserve the title of "the apostle of sunshine."

Near Happy Valley, the home of his childhood, and near Robin Roost, the home of his later years, when that life was ended on earth, his remains were laid to rest in Old Gray Cemetery, at Knoxville, April 5, 1912, amidst a field of floral tributes and in the presence of thousands of sorrowing friends.

Without exception, old and young, male and female, white and black, all who knew him—and they were legions—felt and manifested a grief they could not express and a loss they could not compensate.

That he was loved and honored in his home city and throughout his State with rare fidelity and unanimity was made plain to all who witnessed the outpouring of the people at every station through which the funeral train passed. On the faces of those people could be read the genuine affection they felt for him and the evidence of personal bereavement they suffered.

At Nashville and Knoxville particularly, where the remains lay in state, this sentiment and feeling were impressively shown.

In the sacred soil of his native State, which holds all mortal of such illustrious men as Andrew Jackson, James K. Polk, Andrew Johnson, Isham G. Harris, and William B. Bate, there sleeps none more loved, none closer to the hearts of his people, none more honored, none whose memory will be sweeter and more cherished and more enduring than Senator ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR.

That he possessed the true religious spirit and nature is beautifully shown in the eloquent funeral sermon delivered by his pastor, Dr. Neighbors.

That this spirit caused him to feel and disseminate the joy which the righteous experience here and now was illustrated in his daily life. He inwardly protested, I am sure, against the wording of that good old song "There is a happy land far, far away," and he would have it read, "There is a happy land wherever we may be." To be joyous here, to be happy now, does not militate against but rather presages joy and happiness beyond the grave. If there is any better way to honor the Creator, any saner manner of showing reverence to the Author of our being, any higher evidence of earnest and sincere worship, "in spirit and in truth," than to prize life, value its blessings, spread the gospel of good will and cheerfuiness, see the beauties in all nature, laugh with the rippling waters and romping children, sing with the birds, smile with the stars, glow with the sunlight, join in the music of the spheres, it is difficult to perceive or understand.

In all the relations of life he carried with him this disposition. He did not keep it to himself, but, like the whirling dynamo, he generated it constantly and threw it out so that it affected all within his reach.

Dr. Neighbors well said:

> If I had to state any one thing as the great secret of his great power, I would say it was his great heart—a heart that overflowed all bounds and actuated every movement of his life and made him absolutely invincible before humanity.

In private life, on the lecture platform, in official station, his deep concern was for the happiness and the welfare of his fellow man.

In the splendid tribute referred to, Dr. Neighbors, who knew him intimately and his promptings and nature, well said that it "was never any part of his program to wrong any human being, or harm anything God has ever made"; that his "great nature was too large to be little and too good to be mean."

Just a month before he died he had gone to Tennessee as an ambassador of peace. Men whom he had known for years were at variance with each other, having differences which were driving them further apart, animosities were being engendered, and in the hope that he might bring them together in amity and united purpose, he left Washington, with the olive branch in his hand and love in his bosom, in an effort to compose those differences, heal up any wounds, and promote harmony and good will among his people. He wished for their happiness and contentment, and he desired to see them prosper and direct their energies toward the common good.

So he felt toward his countrymen everywhere.

As governor of his State, as Senator of the United States, he stood for equality before the law, justice, and the ideals that make for progress and greatness.

He had seen his own Southland in ashes and in the throes of despair, and this touched him. At the same time he bore no bitterness. In the last speech he delivered in the Senate he made this characteristic utterance:

Mr. President, I despise sectional jealousy, I abhor sectional animosity, but I do believe in sectional pride and sectional patriotism. I do not fall out with the East for believing that the aurora borealis is the reflection of the fires of eastern furnaces and factories, nor with the West for believing the sunset glow is the reflection of western fields of grain; and why should they fall out with me for entertaining the opinion that the Milky Way is only the picture on the sky of the rice and cotton fields of Dixie?

In more serious vein he displayed the broad vision, the sound reasoning, and the wisdom of the statesman.

Merely remarking, without elaboration, the gentle manners, and pervading good humor of the man, the grace and eloquence of the orator, the inimitable powers of the raconteur, the sweetness of his home life, the tenderness and breadth of his affections, which drew to him a wealth of friendship, I may illustrate his statesmanlike grasp of national questions by quoting the concluding sentences of the speech last mentioned, to wit:

I do not believe that the United States will ever reach the high tide of its glory until we apply the golden rule and deal justly not only with our own people at home, but with the people of other nations. We can not hope to defend the principles of free government and to exemplify the blessings which they bring until we apply them impartially under our own flag. We can not hope to lead all the nations of the earth in commerce and trade until we are willing to buy as well as to sell. We can not hope to perpetuate our free institutions and to hand them down to posterity as a priceless heritage until we wipe from our statute books the last vestige of unequal and unjust taxation, the great destroyer of nations.

As governor he gave his State three honest, efficient, and tranquil administrations. As Senator he illustrated the highest and best qualities of her people in a manner most creditable and in consonance with her glorious history. He lived up to that command pronounced by the Master in reply to the lawyer's inquiry, which furnished the supreme direction for the guidance of human society. Saying this much is equivalent to expressing the conviction that the spirit of our friend, whom we all loved, is to-day in the enjoyment of those blessings guaranteed to "the pure in heart."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on behalf of Oklahoma and the great West, where he has tens of thousands of friends and lovers, on behalf of the special and very affectionate personal regard which I so long have entertained for him, I come to present a tribute of love to the memory of my dear friend, ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR.

His friends loved to call him "BOB TAYLOR," because of the sympathetic good fellowship that radiated from him as light flows from the noonday sun; and he loved to be called by that familiar name, because he much preferred the title given by human sympathy and human affection to any of the public titles and dignities with which his fellow countrymen had delighted to honor him.

No man has been more greatly missed from the United States Senate by his colleagues than this genial, delightful southern friend, this brother-like man, who hailed from Happy Valley on the beautiful Watauga of eastern Tennessee.

He was a most valuable statesman and useful public servant; a wonderful orator, he moved his fellow men to laughter and to tears.

He was an everlasting fountain of wit, of good humor, and of innocent fun, as well as full of wise counsel and of sound judgment. He was a lover of music. He loved to play the violin and to sing, and charmed thousands with "the fiddle and the bow" and with the sweet old songs of long ago. He was a poet in sentiment, in the dreaming of exquisite and beautiful dreams, in building "castles in the air." He was an apostle of happiness. Listen to his beautiful appreciation of music:

The spirit of music, like an archangel, presides over mankind and all visible creation. Her afflatus, divinely sweet, divinely powerful, is breathed on every human heart and inspires every soul to some nobler sentiment, some higher thought, some greater action.

O music, sweetest, sublimest ideal of Omniscience, first born of God, fairest and loftiest seraph of the celestial hierarchy, muse of the beautiful, daughter of the universe!

In the morning of eternity when the stars were young, her first grand oratorio burst upon raptured Diety and thrilled the wondering angels; all heaven shouted; ten thousand times ten thousand jeweled harps, ten thousand times ten thousand angel tongues caught up the song; and ever since, through all the golden cycles its breathing melodies, old as eternity, yet ever new as the flitting hours, have floated on the air of heaven.

He was a lover of children and sympathized with the thoughts of children and his own heart sang in sympathy with the heart of a child. Listen to him describe a child—and the old black mammy:

I saw a cottage among the elms and oaks, and a little curly head toddled at the door. He toddled under the trees, prattling to the birds and playing with the ripening apples that fell on the ground. He toddled among the roses and plucked their leaves as he would have plucked an angel's wings, strewing their glory upon the green grass at his feet. He chased the butterflies from flower to flower and shouted with glee as they eluded his grasp and sailed away on the summer air. Here I thought his childish fancy had built a paradise and peopled it with dainty seraphim and made himself its Adam. He saw the sunlight of Eden glint on every leaf and beam in every petal. The flitting honeybee, the whirling June bug, the fluttering breeze, the silvery pulse beat of the dashing brook, sounded in his ears notes of its swelling music. The iris-winged humming bird, darting like a sunbeam to kiss the pouting lips of the upturned flowers, was to him the impersonation of its beauty. And I said: "Truly, childhood is the nearest approach in this world to the paradise of long ago."

Then I saw him skulking like a culprit in the shrubbery, his face downcast with guilt, his skirts bedraggled and soiled. He had waded the Atlantic Ocean in the mud puddle and stirred up the Mediterranean Sea in the water bucket. He had shipwrecked the young ducks, capsized the goslings, and drowned the kitten, which he imagined a whale. And I said, "There is the old original Adam coming to the surface."

"Lawd bless my soul, jis' look at dat chile. Look at dat face an' dem han's, all kivered wid mud an' mulberry juice. You'se a'gwine to ketch it. Jis' 'zackly like yo' pa—always gittin' into some scrape or nudder, always breakin' into some kind uv debilment. Gwine ter break into Congress some uv dese days sho'. Dey can't keep you out'n it. Come along wid me dis instinct to de baff tub. I'se a'gwine ter wash dat face uv yo'n an' lucidate some uv dat dirt off'n dem han's an' dem clo'es, you triflin' rascal, you." And, so saying, she carried him away, kicking and screaming like a young savage in open rebellion.

And I said, "There is some more of the original Adam." Then I saw him come forth again, washed and dressed in spotless white, like a young butterfly fresh from its chrysalis, and when he got a chance, I saw him slip on his tiptoes into the pantry, and there was the clink of glassware as though a mouse were playing there among the jam pots and preserves. There two little dimpled hands made trip after trip to a rose-colored mouth, bearing burdens of mingling sweets that dripped from cheek and chin and skirt and shoes, subduing the snowy white with the amber of the peach and the purple of the raspberry as he ate of the forbidden fruit.

BOB TAYLOR moved the hearts of men to respond to the tender sentiment of love for the child, the home, and to laugh aloud with honest fun and good humor.

BOB TAYLOR not only had in his heart the love of childhood and of women and of men, but he showed it in his official life. BOB TAYLOR, the lovable, loved men; he knew their weaknesses and their frailties; he knew their innate goodness as well, and did not forget it when men, through some misfortune, came to grief and fell under the iron hand of the law. And he used the pardoning power freely. He "felt the stings of criticism for the liberal use of the pardoning power." Who that realizes human suffering and sorrow and the divine spark of goodness that always remains in the culprit would blame the gentle-hearted BOB TAYLOR? Listen to his defense:

But I saw old mothers with their white locks and wrinkled brows swoon at the governor's feet every day. I saw old fathers with broken hearts and tear-stained faces, and heard them plead by the hour for their wayward boys. I saw a wife and seven children, clad in tatters and rags and barefooted in winter, fall down upon their knees around him who held the pardoning power. I saw a little girl climb upon the governor's knee and put her little arms around his neck, and I heard her ask him if he had little girls; and then I saw her sob upon his bosom as though her little heart would break, and heard her plead for mercy for her poor, miserable, wretched, convict father. I saw want and woe and anguish unutterable pass before the gubernatorial door, and I said, "Let this heartless world condemn, let the critics frown and rail, but he who hath power and doth not temper justice with mercy will cry in vain himself for mercy on that great day when God shall judge the merciful and the unmerciful."

Mr. President, the beloved BOB TAYLOR was born in Happy Valley, east Tennessee, and has made thousands weep with delight describing Happy Valley. He has made Happy Valley, on the beautiful Watauga, immortal.

For 33 years—as Congressman, as three-times governor, as Senator, or in other positions of distinction—he faithfully served his country.

I knew him intimately and always was delighted to be in his genial and charming company. He was so broad minded, so generous in his sympathies, putting his arms around men and teaching them the better things of life. He was so kind and gentle and lovable. I never heard him speak an unkind word of any human being. He has been a blessing to Tennessee. He has been a shining light in every place in life. He probably had the personal affection of more people than any other man in the United States. He has done great honor to Tennessee, to the South, and to human nature. I rejoice in the opportunity of paying my tribute of love to him.

If every soul to whose happiness he has directly contributed should bring a flower and lay it in loving memory upon his grave, his monument would be a wilderness of blooms and a pyramid of flowers filling the earth with perfume.

He was an apostle of love, of laughter, good humor, and song. He was a lover of the beautiful, of sentiment, and of story. He was indeed a son of the Most High, a son of the King of kings. Let him speak the last word in this tribute of memory:

I am a king. I dwell in the palace of love, by the brawling brook of laughter, on the brink of the river of song. And so are all the sons and daughters of Adam equal kings and queens with me whose hearts beat time to nature's music and whose souls are in love with the beautiful. There is a crown of sunshine for every brow by day, a coronet of stars by night. The angels of light hover above us all, and arch the heavens with the rainbow of hope for all, and bring from the vapory vineyards of the clouds the sparkling champagne of pure crystal water to bless the lips of all. All the delightful dreams that spread their wings above the horizon of the heart, all the glorious thoughts that fly out from the heaven of the brain, all the jubilees of joy that crowd the circling hours of mortal life, are the regal gifts of God to mankind—the royal heritage of all. There are songs sweeter than were ever sung; there is beauty which defies even the brush of the Raphael for you and for me and for us all.

Let men not grieve for BOB TAYLOR. He is with the King of kings, dwelling "in the palace of love," listening to and singing "songs sweeter than were ever sung," delighting in the "beauty which defies even the brush of the Raphael" in the ineffable glory of God, which he foresaw and often exquisitely portrayed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to-day we honor the memory of a beloved colleague who died in the service of the Nation. In paying tribute to the memory of ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR we find abundant thought for memorial eulogy.

Senators have dwelt upon his rare eloquence, his scholarly attainments, his devotion to every worthy cause, and his distinguished service to his State and to the Nation. We have been reminded of notable instances in his illustrious public career. The life of the late Senator from Tennessee was rich in achievement. He occupied high station with honor to himself and usefulness to his country. He never faltered in a public or a private duty, and to-day his loss is mourned and his fame treasured by a grateful people, not alone in the Commonwealth whose citizenship he adorned, but throughout the length and breadth of the Republic, whose interests he served in the Senate of the United States with conspicuous ability and fidelity.

Mr. President, I shall touch upon a single phase of his extraordinary personality. Notwithstanding his record of accomplishment, the impression which his life's work made and the memory of his deeds that linger is that of the poet, the orator, the genius of good humor, the dreamer, the idealist. Brave and courageous though he was, his courage and bravery were chastened and glorified by a kindness and gentleness of spirit that banished hatred and malice and created about him an atmosphere of genial warmth, in which blossomed and thrived the beautiful flowers of friendship, love, and affection.

My acquaintance with ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR in this Chamber was all too brief—aye, measured by the span of life, but a moment—and yet a moment of life, whose rejuvenating radiance is undimmed and the cheering influence of which I shall cherish through all the passing years.

Throughout his varied and interesting career he bore upon his shield a message of good will and encouragement to his fellow men. His most effective weapon was laughter, his invincible armor the pure gold of a generous and loyal fraternity.

'Tis well in our all too serious workaday world to pause to pay homage to one whose life was a rebuke to selfishness and an appeal to the better angels of our nature.

Who shall say that the austere statesman or the unyielding warrior does more for the betterment and uplift of mankind than one who leads the children of men into the paths of poesy and laughter, and, turning away from the frown of a Napoleon, seeks inspiration in the sunshine of Tom Moore and Bobby Burns?

It would seem to have been more than a coincidence that the birthplace of Senator TAYLOR was the town of Happy Valley, for to him and to those blest with his companionship the world was a valley of happiness, and if earnest prayers are answered, if fond hopes are realized, he passed through the shadow of death into the Happy Valley of eternal peace.

I deem it a privilege to have this opportunity to add my humble tribute of affectionate esteem and admiration to those of the thousands of men and women whose lives were brightened and whose days were gladdened by the brilliant mind and honest heart and faithful service of this smiling child of nature from Sunny Tennessee.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, many years before ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR became a Member of this body I met him in the State of West Virginia, a strong, active man, and he then told me that if he could ever get a primary to settle, who should be the nominee of his party for United States Senator he would come to the Senate. Afterwards, either by action of the committee of his party or the laws of his State, a primary for this office was held in the State of Tennessee and he was nominated and elected to the Senate.

This incident illustrates the character of the man. No one ever had a firmer faith in the people of his State, and no one ever had better reason for that faith. During the many years of his active life in politics one had only to cross the line into Tennessee and to talk with the people in any of the walks of life to comprehend that Mr. TAYLOR had the confidence of the great body of the people of the State, and, conditions being normal, could command their votes. In any discussion with him of politics in his State it could be easily observed that he never doubted that his only source of power lay in his ability to reach the heart and the intelligence of the constituency of his State.

The acquaintance which I formed on the occasion mentioned lasted until his death. When I came to the Senate I found him here, loved and respected by every Member of the body. I renewed the acquaintance that I had formed in West Virginia, and I found him here in public life as I had found him in West Virginia in private life, a frank, open-hearted, kindly, lovable man, always ready to do something for others.

My years of acquaintance justify me in saying that, if his wishes could be observed, this occasion should be given up to absolute frankness in everything that is to be said of his life and services. Undeserved praise he did not want; indeed he shrank at commendation justly earned and honestly bestowed; and I think that he would have his friends now speak from the heart, so that the people of the State which he served, honored, and loved would see in the pictures here the same man, the same governor, the same Senator who made an enviable reputation on the public platform from one end of the country to the other. His name may not be connected with any of the great acts of constructive legislation because of the shortness of his service in this body and the condition of his health during the latter part of his service; and yet everyone associated with him on committees and in the work of the Senate will testify that he was always prompt and ever useful in the work assigned to him. He had the faculty to listen patiently, to do justice to all sides of a question, and then to come to a reasonable and just conclusion that he would express in a few homely words. He had courage to do a thing solely because it was right and because it appealed to his judgment, and while he did not always take the time to disclose the processes through which his mind had passed in coming to a conclusion, yet that conclusion, when expressed, showed that he had mastered the subject and that he had weighed every argument which had been adduced on the question. He was a useful, honest, capable Member of this body, and never failed to rise to any occasion which demanded the best of his thought or the best of his well-recognized oratorical ability. As an orator he was unique. It has been said of him that if every voter in Tennessee could hear him speak in a campaign he would be invincible in that State. When on his feet on the stump or on the lecture platform he swayed the audience from laughter to tears without apparent effort.

I have seen an audience convulsed with laughter and moved to tears by his eloquence within a quarter of an hour, and I have seen him rise to flights of oratory unsurpassed by anyone whom I have ever had the pleasure of hearing. The secret of this power over an audience lay in the depths of his sentiment, of his power to picture any incident or any sentiment in pure Anglo-Saxon and in his unaffected simplicity. He knew and comprehended, as few public men have, the life of the farmer, the wage earner, and the business man of this country. His great heart took in the struggles of labor and the hardships of the farmer. He could see life as they saw it, and then he had the power to make a picture of that life and in words could fairly spread it upon a canvas before his audience. He could show the solemn side of laughter and at the same time could smile upon the most poignant sorrow of life. His heart was in sympathy with the life of the people, and he seemed to grasp intuitively the strength and the weakness of the audience which he was addressing. If by an orator is meant a man who can present his own thoughts to an audience and make the audience feel and think as he feels, then Mr. TAYLOR was a prince among orators. He not only loved the State of Tennessee, but he loved the people of Tennessee. In his public discourse and in his private conversation he dwelt upon his boyhood life in that State and the early struggles of those pioneers who went over the mountains and formed that great Commonwealth. Truly, his loyalty to his State and his devotion to his people caused him to see the world through the eyes of Tennessee. He cared nothing for money or for wealth. Business did not interest him. He loved the mountains, the rivers, flowers, music, poetry, and the people. Although he had decided musical talent, he never attempted to cultivate it beyond the songs and tunes of his native mountains. He played the fiddle, not the violin, and his touch upon the strings of that instrument was as sweet as his voice when it went out to a native audience upon a pleasant subject. But he played only the tunes of Tennessee, and his fiddling and his oratory were both pitched for his beloved Tennesseeans.

Truly, he died too soon. He was just entering upon a field of usefulness to his State in this body. The great battles of constructive legislation which must concern his party in the near future would have found in him a man with sound judgment, and these important questions would have found in him a champion whose life had been devoted to their solution. He was loved as a friend by every Member of this body, and there is probably not a man in public life here who does not sincerely regret his loss.

The thousands of West Virginians who knew him and loved him truly mourn with Tennessee and his family the death of this great and good man.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, Death did a cruel thing when he took him from our midst. BOB TAYLOR was a rare combination of humor, pathos, and sunshine. His hand was ever open and his heart ever in sympathy with the poor. When he entered the humblest habitation of sorrow, darkness was dispelled by the light of his winsome smile and cheering voice. He was naturally a poet and musician, and had he centered his attention on either would have become famous. But he preferred the political theater, and in that he was an eminent success. His very name seemed to carry with it an irresistible force in Tennessee. Time and again he was elevated to place and power, but through all he was the same plain, unassuming gentleman. I am proud to say that he was my friend and that we loved each other with all the strong affection which it is possible for man to entertain for man. To me his death was a source not only of profound but personal grief. However, it is painful to dwell on these personal relations, for they only cause the waves of sorrow which have receded to return with overpowering force.

I shall not deal at length with his public services, for these are a part of the country's history and known to all. Suffice it to say, he was faithful, efficient, and honorable.

No man ever loved his State and people with more idolatrous devotion. To them he was always loyal and true. To him the Tennessee mountains had a fascination, and from them he drew the inspiration of his wonderful success.

In this body he was loved and respected by all, and his death was to us the source of the greatest sorrow.

What we say here counts for little. We can not remove the pangs of distress that afflict his loved ones. We may be able to brush away a tear, but we can not supplant it with a smile. All we can do is to record our love and appreciation for the man and from our heart of hearts express a word of sympathy to those who stagger beneath the fearful blow that has fallen upon him. But we can and do express the hope and belief that he has been gathered as a rich sheaf to the harvest home, where in company with the angels he joins in heavenly music, and that he shall partake of all the joys of immortality.

To him we alter our salutation from "Good morning" to "Farewell," but we shall cherish his memory and feel and know that each of us is better for having known him.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. President, Senator ROBERT L. TAYLOR, though poor in early life in things of financial value, was rich, indeed, in the truest sense in the great multitude of his friends. His friends stood the test. They never deserted him. He gripped them with a power that was stronger than steel. No man ever had friends in greater multitude. Senator TAYLOR did not seek friendship for the hope of reward, but for the enjoyment, as Cicero said, "which is found in love itself." Senator TAYLOR'S platform for life was "All men are neighbors."

Cicero says:

> There is no true life which does not find the restful pleasure that proceeds from the mutual affection of friends. What can be sweeter than to have a friend to whom one may venture to confide all things as to one's self? What enjoyment would there be in success unless one had a friend to rejoice in that success even as himself? And finally all other subjects of human endeavor are suited only to particular ends; wealth for use, power to acquire prestige, pleasures to enjoy, good health that one may be free from pain and perform the functions of the body. But friendship, on the other hand, combines many advantages. Whichever way you turn, it is an ever-present aid; from no place is it barred; never is it unseasonable; never a cause of annoyance. And so to compare it with what are commonly termed the necessities of life, we find friendship of more general advantage than water and fire.

To be denied water and fire was to be banished from home. Home is where friends are—

> For friendship renders prosperity more delightful and lightens adversity by dividing and sharing our sorrows.

ROBERT L. TAYLOR, when a young man, was elected governor of Tennessee. He naturally desired a second term. His nomination was bitterly contested. I was a delegate to the convention which was authorized to nominate his successor. It was perhaps the longest political convention on record. I with his other friends voted every time for ROBERT L. TAYLOR. His opponents pitted many candidates older and longer in the service and of greater reputation against him. Gov. TAYLOR held his delegates intact to the close of the sixth day. All this time he had a majority of the delegates, but not the two-thirds that the party rules required. I have never seen such fidelity. He loved the people and they loved him. His delegates, most of them from the rural districts, remained in the city of Nashville at a heavy expense to themselves and had no second choice. His nomination and triumphant election created immense enthusiasm in the State and greatly increased his popularity.

ROBERT L. TAYLOR will go down in history as "the apostle of sunshine." He lived for the happiness of others. He made everybody about him have a good time. His perpetual good humor was contagious. There was joy and gladness wherever he was. During his first term as governor the young man was very much criticized for going against his party platform in advocating Federal aid to education. My county was against him. I invited him to lecture to my school and said to him:

> When the roll of counties is called at the approaching convention, Bedford County will stand alphabetically almost at the top of the roll.

He delivered a great speech on that occasion on "The cabins of Tennessee," and with great eloquence showed what education could do for the poor boy. He never afterwards lost a Bedford County delegation. It was marvelous how he could move the people with his good-humored eloquence. His love for the people was sincere.

The children never forgot his visits to a home, and always lined up with him when old enough to vote. His visits to my home were green spots in the children's memory. At night after his inimitable lectures he would assemble the schoolboys around him, and they would enjoy his splendid social entertainment till the wee small hours, greeting his fine wit and unique anecdotes with shouts of merry laughter. He brought—

> Jest and youthful jollity,
> Quips and cranks * * *
> Nods and becks and wreathed smiles,
> Sport that wrinkled care derides
> And laughter holding both his sides.

GOV. TAYLOR was criticized for his number of pardons. He said to me, when the papers were full of censure: "WEBB, I asked the Tennessee Legislature to make proper provision for youthful convicts; not to send them to the penitentiary, to that school of crime with hardened villains. They would not grant my request. They shall not send the boys to that school of crime as long as I am governor of Tennessee."

It was that splendid stand of Gov. TAYLOR that called the attention of the people to this great need in favor of proper provision for those guilty of the indiscretions of youth, and needing reformatories for education and training into good citizenship and not a penitentiary at hard labor in the company of those older and more vicious incorrigibles that could not be reformed and made good citizens. This was right and required great force of character and strong conviction to stem the tide of adverse criticism. The papers never gave him credit for the list of young people pardoned—just the number. It looked large. Gov. TAYLOR in that same interview said to me: "WEBB, what would you do if a lovely little country girl were to nestle down in your lap, put her arms around your neck, and ask you to give her her father for a Christmas gift, and tell you that she did not even know her father—that he did kill the man, but was drunk and did not know what he was doing? WEBB, she took him home. I could not help it."

At this recital on the train Gov. TAYLOR'S eyes were wet with tears. Oh, that splendid sympathy—that great big heart was Tennessee's greatest pride. We were obliged to love him. What nobler act of man than to show tenderness, and love, and sympathy, and mercy? What is finer in man than to comfort the brokenhearted? Where did Gov. TAYLOR learn those splendid traits except from Him who gave us the greatest parable, the Good Samaritan, and from Him who said:

Come unto Me all ye who are weary and heavy laden.

I came to Washington unexpectedly to fill the unexpired term of Senator TAYLOR. Every minute has been in demand. I had no time to investigate with sufficient care his political record that covered a whole generation. My tribute to him is confined to my own personal experience. His political record is history and is read by all men. I desire to put the man, the neighbor, the friend, with his great charm, into the record.

When my former pupil, Senator Edward Ward Carmack, the gifted genius and brilliant statesman, and Senator ROBERT L. TAYLOR, the great "apostle of sunshine," as he loved to be called, both my friends and both standing for progressive measures in the interest of the rising generation as they saw them, competed for the honor of a seat in this Chamber, and I had supported Senator Carmack, I could never detect that the greeting thereafter of my greatly esteemed friend, Senator TAYLOR, was less cordial or his handshake less hearty. Little men can not understand this. Big-hearted and big-brained and well-rounded men like ROBERT L. TAYLOR can differ with his friends and still esteem and love them. He never impugned the motives of those who differed with him.

Senator ROBERT L. TAYLOR'S contributions to churches and charitable institutions all over the State were on a most magnificent scale. His wonderful drawing power as a lecturer would have given him a princely income if he had utilized it for selfish ends. I have seen him again and again in rural districts with vast multitudes of delighted people at a pay lecture given for the benefit of a church or some worthy charity. He not only invested his money, but, what was much better, he invested himself with all his varied and charming accomplishments in all enterprises that had for their ends the betterment of his fellow man.

Tennesseans all loved Senator ROBERT L. TAYLOR as they never loved another. He was an optimist after my own heart:

One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed tho' right were worsted, wrong would triumph;
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better, sleep to wake.

Mr. President, I ask leave to incorporate as a part of my address the great sermon preached by Rev. W. S. Neighbors, D. D., of Bristol, Tenn., at Senator TAYLOR'S funeral in Knoxville April 5, 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The sermon referred to is as follows:

THE FUNERAL ORATION AT THE BIER OF SENATOR ROBERT L. TAYLOR.

(By Rev. W. S. Neighbors.)

"Of the public life of Senator TAYLOR I shall not try to speak, except incidentally. I am in nowise furnished for such a duty, and, besides, the Nation has spoken. Almost every State in the Union has spoken. Every railroad station from Washington to Nashville and back to Knoxville has spoken. Every great daily newspaper has spoken, and most wisely, of Senator TAYLOR'S public career.

"I wish I were fully able to unfold to you the secrets of Senator TAYLOR'S marvelous power over men. When, years ago, I knew him less intimately than when he died, if I had been asked for these wonderful secrets I would have given them without hesitation and perhaps quite dogmatically.

"First of all, I would have said that the secret of his power over men was his unbounded friendship for all sorts and conditions of humanity, reaching its climax in that proverb, 'He who would have friends must show himself friendly.' I still hold to this as a general proposition, but what is friendship? It is not a baseless fabric. It must be founded on something that makes it secure.

"In the second place, I would have years ago told you that the secret of this man's power was in the beautiful songs and stories that he sang and told all over his native State—songs and stories that touched every chord in every human heart. But then songs and stories are not in themselves complete. There must be something back of them to give them point and pathos and pungency and power. I might have sung all of his songs and told all of his stories to all of his audiences and yet have won no heart.

"In the third place, I would have said that the secret of his power over men was due to the simple way in which he uttered his thoughts. I still hold to that as a reasonable trite proposition, but what is simplicity? It is not shallowness—the mere play upon the surface of things. It is not a natural or a common product belonging to men in general. Only the greatest men can be simple; only the great men are capable of going to the very heart of things, bringing up the hidden depths and making them transparent.

"Fourth. I made the statement years ago that his power with an audience was due to the fact that his soul was full of music; that in every other human being there are musical chords slumbering in the hidden recesses of their nature, waiting only for the touch of a master hand to respond. But what made it a master hand? I used to have little enough musical sense to believe that if a score of persons were playing upon the same kind of instruments, all tuned alike and playing the same piece, that there would be the same results, but I very recently learned that that is not true. A number were playing upon pianos. They were all tuned alike. The players were playing the same piece, and yet as I walked through the campus I could easily pick out some players from others. Somehow or other there was something within their very souls going into their instruments and bringing forth strains of music that were mellow, full of pathos and sentiment, winning all hearts who heard them that day.

"Senator TAYLOR had that indescribable combination of rare gifts and graces that made him a master before all sorts and conditions of humanity. If I had to state any one thing as the secret of his great power, I would say it was his great heart—a heart that overflowed all bounds and actuated every movement of his life and made him absolutely invincible before humanity. I have said it before, and I say it again, if Senator TAYLOR had moved to any other State in this Union and they had given him his citizenship in 15 minutes after he arrived, he could have run for the highest honor in the gift of that State and under all reasonable conditions would have won out over any man pitted against him.

"Some have been so ungrateful or unthoughtful as to hint that Senator TAYLOR was not a deep nor a strong man in the affairs of state. I am sure that those who knew him best never made such a statement. He was always deep enough to get to the bottom of things, and that is deep enough. He was always strong enough to tear down the fortifications of all of his opponents and carry the day, and that was strong enough.

"I have seen him when whole multitudes came floating into port upon the tears that flowed down his manly cheeks; I have seen him with a mere wave of his hand silence or stir the crowds just as he willed. I have seen the mere twinkle of his eye change the whole atmosphere of the listening crowds. I have seen the pucker of his lips make his hearers laugh or cry.

"But it is of the humbler things in his life that I wish to speak to-day. He was a complete exception to the old rule. 'A prophet is not without honor save in his own country.' He was most highly honored at home. The people believed in him and followed him. Again and again I have seen him step off of the train at his home town after weeks of absence, and his way was literally blocked by people of all grades and distinctions; even the negro and the little children followed him. Anxious though he was to get home, the crowds about him often exacted a speech before they would let him go. I have seen his family play a trick on the town people by sending a closed carriage to some secret place and notify him to get off on the opposite side, slip to his carriage, and steal away to his home.

"His relation to the negroes was remarkable. In his dealings with them there was that same open and frank and tender interest. With him there was no ax to grind. He simply cared for them, and they responded graciously to his great spirit. In some of his great lectures, where he mentions the name of 'Rastus' and 'Ephraham,' you may have thought those were fancy names, but they were the real names of the real negroes that belonged to the Senator's father before the war. In one of his lectures he tells at length the story of 'Uncle Rufus,' and how he had come to his home from time to time, and how that one afternoon he stayed with him in his yard and talked of the days 'before the war' till in memory the boy was again upon the old negro's back, riding along the banks of the beautiful Watauga. But, as he tells it, when the evening shadows were lengthening Uncle Rufus grew serious and said:

"'BOB, my boy, I'se not gwine to be heah much longer. I'se already had two visions of the chariot of de Lord, and when it comes de third time I'se agwine to step in and go hom'.' And sure enough in just a few days after that afternoon the chariot of the Lord descended for the third time, and Uncle Rufus went home. He tells you this in one of his lectures, but there is another part of that story his personal modesty would not allow him to tell. I tell it to you to-day. When the old darkey died, 'BOB' TAYLOR bought his shroud and casket, and chartered a whole train to take the darkeys and all of the white people who wished to go back to Happy Valley, the burying ground of the Taylor family. As they put the remains of the old darkey away close beside his master, TAYLOR stood at his grave and wept, as on another day he stood at his father's grave and wept.

"Here is another story setting forth his tender relationship to his father's old darkeys. Returning from one of his lecture tours, he said to me: 'I have had the greatest trip of my life this time. Over in Arkansas I found that I had a few days to spare between my lecture engagements, and I found that I was within a few miles of some of my father's old darkeys, who moved away to that State after the war, whom I had not seen for 30 years. I gave Rice, my manager, the dodge and went to spend the time with these old negroes. When I got to the community and told them that I was BOB TAYLOR, they gathered around me in a circle and looked me in the face and cried out in unison, "Is dat you, BOB?" and I said, "This is BOB." They fell back and laughed. They gathered around me again and more excitedly said, "Is dat you, BOB?" and I said, "This is BOB TAYLOR." Then they cried and said, "BOB, we are mighty glad to see you. We haven't seed you since you's a boy back at the old hom'." One of them said, "BOB, my son Jim's been gone for three years, but if anybody was to ask me which I'd rudder see, BOB TAYLOR or my son Jim, I swear 'fore the Lord I could not tell."'

"If you never knew Senator TAYLOR in his home, much of the best and most remarkable in him you never knew. No one set of words can adequately describe him here. He was the liveliest of the lively, the greatest of the great, the saddest of the sad, and the sickest of the sick, according to the conditions that obtained at home. If every member of his family was happy and strong, he was the jolliest boy there—into every kind of mischief and playing every kind of prank, a perfect child among the children—but if any member of his familly was sick the whole scene was changed. He was the sickest of the sick. I have seen the dear, sensitive soul walk the floor in agony, face all pinched and drawn, over the sufferings of any member of his household. I have seen him again, when the doctor said that the patient was out of danger, stir the whole household with laughter almost before the tears of grief were gone from his face.

"Happy Valley, the home of his childhood, and Robin's Roost, the home of his later years, were not poetic fancies with him. They were to him the best of all he held sacred and dear. As a statesman he held lofty aspirations, but these were mere vision dreams that attracted only the paradise of fools as compared with his home. Only a few weeks ago it was my pleasure to spend a day with him in Sullivan County. I was sent for to dedicate a schoolhouse. Senator TAYLOR was sent for to make the occasion a great day for those honest sons of toil. He made it. There were no Republicans there that day. Whatever they were elsewhere and on other days they were all blended into a great brotherhood that day. The Senator reached his climax when he urged the boys to stay on the farm, build up good homes, and be true to 'Sallie and the babies.'

"To him the church was a very sacred place. It was verily the house of God and never a place for merriment or even the lightest things with him. He was never quite willing to give any of his lectures in the church, though they were as pure as the snow. 'No, no,' he would say. 'Let me speak in a warehouse or a barn, or out under the spreading oaks, but not there. That is the house of God.'

"When home from his public duties you could count on his being at church every Sunday, and he was always reverend and responsive. The hardest work I ever had with him as his pastor was to control him in his gifts to charity. I have held for years that this thing of charity is often a very doubtful proposition; that the only charity worth the name is to help people help themselves; but Senator TAYLOR'S heart frequently got the upper hand of his head and the upper hand of me. His great, tender soul made him so acute to the sufferings of others that it seemed he could hear a little child's cry of want clear across the city, and the murmur of hunger stirred him so completely that he would give all he had and ask no questions. I used to almost wish I could send him away at Christmas time. I found that designing people, the professional tramp, and beggars had found out his nature and were preying upon him. He would not stop at buying apples by the barrel for the poor and to make them happy, but would buy whole wagonloads and give them out to all grades and distinctions of human beings, white or black, it made no difference to him.

"Senator TAYLOR had a large religious nature, and the last time I ever talked with him on the subject of religion was out there in front of the church. He and I had driven over to hear Bishop Hendrix preach. When we got here a love feast was going on. The doors were closed and locked. A large crowd on the outside was trying to get in. He turned to me, and with a pathetic expression on his face, said: 'Neighbors, that reminds me of the final judgment, with many getting there too late and finding the door locked. I hope that when my little day is done I will not get there too late, and somehow, through God's infinite mercy, He will let me in.'

"A friend of his and mine said to me just a few days ago, 'Senator TAYLOR was in my home recently; my children gathered around him and asked him to sing for them. He sang several little songs that amused them very much, but finally he said, "Children, I want to sing you one more song." He then beautifully and tenderly sang, "Jesus, lover of my soul, let me to Thy bosom fly."'

"Friends, I hasten to a close. Senator TAYLOR would not allow me to pronounce him faultless if he could speak. He would say in his own inimitable way, 'Neighbors, you know me. You know I am just like a human being, with limitations like other men, full of mistakes and blunders'; but I would be compelled to say, 'Yes, Senator TAYLOR, I know that, and I will be true to your wishes, but you must allow me to say another thing upon my own responsibility; this: It was never any part of your program to wrong any human being or harm anything that God has ever made. Senator, as I have seen you and known you, allow me to say most gently, your great nature was too large to be little and too good to be mean.'

"When Dickens was bringing out his Old Curiosity Shop by chapters the readers appealed to him, 'Do not let Little Nell die; it's a life so beautiful'; but Dickens replied: 'I have to let her die; I can't help it. She must die to complete the story and her life work.'

"When Senator TAYLOR was reported seriously ill, hearts from all over Tennessee and this Nation went up, 'O God, do not let him die'; but God had to let him die; die to complete his life story, die to bury out of sight all little human defects and blemishes, and lift him into that sublimer light and life where men are blended into such a brotherhood as to remember what is only good and true.

"And this his epitaph shall be
When ended are his days:
None knew him but to love him,
None named him but to praise.

"Like a dream floating from out the far way there comes to me a story: A long and doubtful conflict had been raging between contending armies. A regiment of one of the armies determined one day to dislodge the enemy fortified on yonder summit; said that was the key of victory. Early in the day they made a desperate charge, and were repulsed. They rallied and charged again. The standard bearer fell, pierced by a cruel shot. They were about to retreat, when an Irish lad seized the flag, bravely rallied and led the regiment in the final charge, and won the day, but just as the day was won the Irish lad fell mortally wounded. Some days afterwards the regiment was marching through a stretch of country, and coming near a village, Bridget, as by intuition knowing whose regiment it was, seized her broom and went forth to meet it. When she got there she straightened herself, shouldered her broom, and fell into line. A jeer swept down the line. The colonel said sternly: 'By what right dare you march in this regiment?' Looking up through her tears, she jabbered: 'Me Jaimie's regiment; me Jaimie's regiment.' A hush close akin to the sacred and holy swept down the line; every man stood at attention. The colonel said in subdued tones: 'Madam, do you mean to say that you are the mother of the Irish lad that fell at yonder summit the other day?' She jabbered back: 'Me boy; me boy.' Then said the colonel: 'A mother who can present to the world such a son as that has a right to march in this regiment. Fall in! Forward march!'

"Senator TAYLOR, this State's standard bearer, fell in the thick of the fight the other day with his face to the foe. O Tennessee! thou who didst give to the Nation such a gifted son hast the right to march in the front rank of States; and surely the life of such a noble brother will inspire 10,000 younger brothers to fall in line and march to the Nation's strength and glory."

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR GEORGE S. NIXON.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON). The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Nevada will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 458) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow of the death of the Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON, late a Senator from the State of Nevada.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy therof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, Senator GEORGE S. NIXON was born in Placer County, Cal., April 2, 1860, of pioneer parents from Tennessee who were part of the great migratory movement to the West in the early fifties. They were probably caught, like hundreds of others, by the glamor of tales that opened to their young fancy vast possibilities for the venturesome. The irridescent hopes that lured them so far must have lacked realization or, like many others, they may have won and lost. Be that as it may, Senator NIXON's parents were unable to give their boy the advantages of education usually enjoyed by most of our American boys as a heaven-born right, and his training in the public schools ended at an early age.

In youth he lived the life of the usual farmer lad. To gain a little money he availed himself of his great skill in shooting, and wandered over the California hills seeking game. It was a hard life, but he was strong, young, and happy. He loved nature and had a passion for flowers and all growing things—tastes that were stimulated by this roving life.

I never heard him complain or seek sympathy for any hard luck, and he had his disappointments like other men. It is not unlikely that his youth was colored with much talk of his parents' wanderings, descriptions of all they had endured in their search after fortune, their journey over the Plains, sacrifices made, and possibly good claims lost. In mining one often reaps what another sows, and it is hard to find any western life in the early fifties free from the wreckage of human hopes. He was proud of his pioneer parents. In an address he made in his last campaign I was impressed by the vibrant quality he put into the simple phrase of "I was nursed at the breast of a pioneer woman." It was like a shout of triumph.

He made his way through forty-odd years of effort, with the moderate rewards achieved by the average man; but in middle life, at the first whispering of a possible treasure in the desert at Tonopah, the pioneer blood asserted itself, and NIXON was among the first in the camp.

He had in his earlier years a varied experience as telegraph operator, station and express agent in remote stations in Nevada; he entered a bank at Reno and soon made himself indispensable to his employers. Later on he organized a bank at Winnemucca, Nev., and became its cashier, and during this time he was elected to the State legislature as a candidate of the Republican Party. In 1892, like many others, he drifted from the political moorings of a lifetime and identified himself with those who, under various political names, were struggling to relieve the energies of the country from the evil effects of the contracting gold volume. Though I belonged to a different party, we drifted politically together during this period, and regardless of party we identified ourselves with the bimetallic movement through which, by the full restoration of silver as a money metal, it was hoped to end the era of diminishing values and contracting energies. At that time barely sufficient gold was produced to satisfy the demands of the world's dentistry and the arts, and none understood better than Senator NIXON the quantitative theory of money and the effect of the quantity of the circulating medium upon values.

The extraordinary and unanticipated increase in the production of gold put an end to this movement, and we both drifted back to our original parties; but the close intimacy of this association gave me a clear insight into the quickness of his perception and the clearness and vigor of his intellect. I formed a friendship for him which strengthened, notwithstanding our political opposition. I could not feel that we were in antagonism, and felt assured that we would some time drift again together by a mutual process into political accord.

For many years after this he pursued the active life of a banker, identifying himself with most of the activities of Nevada, until finally, as a result of his helpfulness to others, he became the associate of George Wingfield in a mining enterprise in the desert region of Tonopah. Considerable fortune was realized in this, and later on their energies expanded in every form of mining enterprise and embraced the famous Goldfield mine, which was conducted by them with extraordinary judgment, skill, and integrity, and from which both realized large fortunes.

During this period, although the State seemed overwhelmingly Democratic, with characteristic quickness of perception and judgment, he threw himself upon the crest of the wave of Roosevelt's popularity and in a campaign against apparently hopeless odds, supported by an acquaintance and popularity that were widespread, he was swept into the United States Senate. There with rare wisdom he concluded to abandon the active pursuit of money-making and to devote himself to his public work and at the same time to secure to himself the pleasures of friendship and of social life which ease of circumstances presented to him.

He was able to invest his holdings in some of the State's requirements, and the community in which he lived received a direct benefit from his prosperity. He established a chain of banks, and in the panic of 1907 maintained their prestige by his courage and promptitude. He built an opera house in Reno and gave a theater to Winnemucca, controlled more by the desire to put pleasure into the lives of Nevada people than to obtain personal gain. He was one of the few men whose success was shared by many. There was a general satisfaction when he won. His sympathetic kindliness and courage were recognized by all.

In such radical changes of fortune a man is apt to make enemies; the contrast is too great; old companions are sometimes hurt and slip away, and there are the disappointed, envious of one who wins where others fail, but with NIXON it was different. He had a cheerful, sympathetic way about him that put all at ease. Though he always spoke to me as "NEWLANDS," I found myself calling him again and again "George," for he was George—our GEORGE NIXON to all the State of Nevada. He had the rare wisdom of realizing when he had enough and was not willing to allow his faculties to be absorbed in the mere greed of getting.

He became the devoted supporter of every measure that would benefit the State and the section which he loved, and at the same time took a broad and catholic view of all matters tending to the advancement of the entire country. He became chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and a member of the important Committee on Appropriations. His social qualities endeared him to his colleagues, and his acute and accurate judgment, rarely displayed in public speech, was always at the service of the committees to which he belonged and of his friends, whom he delighted to assist.

Disdaining the crowded life of the city, he purchased an extensive suburban place on one of the most commanding hills near Washington, from which there stretched an expanding view of the Potomac and of Washington, and there built a home of rare beauty and taste. He built a similar home on the bank of the Truckee River, near Reno, a sparkling stream, making its way from the incomparable Lake Tahoe and stretching through a valley surrounded by noble and effort-defying mountains—a scene embracing a view of rare grandeur; and upon the banks of Lake Tahoe he built a modest cottage, in which some of the most satisfactory hours were spent. In these several places, which demonstrated the nicety of his taste and the delicacy of his nature, he was glad to share with his friends the delights of his possessions. Only a year or so before his death he was reelected, showing his confidence in the strength of his popular support by voluntarily submitting his election to a direct primary.

Gratified by his reelection, confident of the affectionate regard of his constituency, he was looking forward to a further realization of satisfaction in a sane, kindly, and philosophic life, unvexed either by ambition or avarice, when a neglected complaint necessitated a surgical operation which prematurely ended his life at the age of 52.

Having reached the decision that an operation was necessary, he quickly met the issue, at a time when his devoted wife and son were away, and his friends had hardly heard of the crisis when his death was announced.

I recall the sadness with which I made my way to the hospital where his spirit had taken flight, and the sympathetic consideration with which I found Vice President SHERMAN attending to every detail of the last sad ministrations. Mr. SHERMAN, though then in every appearance of health, well knew that his own days were numbered, and yet there was nothing to indicate the exigencies of his own condition in the calmness and considerateness of his demeanor. Attending with a sorrowing Senate the final ceremonies, his was the last face that I saw at the railway station as we departed with the remains of our dear friend on the sorrowful journey westward. Bearing to the afflicted wife a tender letter of sympathy from the Chief Magistrate of the Nation, who knew and valued Senator NIXON, the funeral cortege made its way to the mountains of Nevada, and there was met by a remarkable gathering from all parts of the State of men in every class and condition of life, who sought to mark their respect and regard for their Senator; and there the body of our dead friend, seized untimely from a life of serenity and affection, was consigned to its last resting place.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President—

Whether at Naishapur or Babylon,
Whether the cup with sweet or bitter run,
The wine of life keeps oozing drop by drop,
The flowers of life keep falling one by one.

The mutations of time work a mighty havoc in the affairs of men.

Of the 90 men who constituted the Senate of the United States when I entered this body six years ago, 23 have since died, not including the Vice President—more than one-fourth of the entire membership.

Of the 90 men then constituting its membership but 40 now remain, and after the 4th day of March there will be left but 26 of the men who made up its membership on March 4, 1907.

One year ago, looking around this Chamber, the ordinary man would have said that GEORGE NIXON'S hold on life was probably as good as any Member of this body, and in all human probability better than the overwhelming majority of us. I thought so. Then in the very prime of his physical manhood, the picture of robust health, congenial, vivacious, of a most happy disposition, who would have prophesied that he of all of us would not have lived out and beyond the allotted three score years and ten?

I was not in Washington at the time of his death, and when I read the news of his sudden demise I could scarcely credit its truthfulness. That GEORGE NIXON was dead did not seem possible.

We who knew him in the intimate daily association that comes with service in this body, in the open Senate, in the committee, and in the more intimate association of the cloakroom, the office, and the home, will each bear sincere testimony of his good-fellowship, integrity, level headedness, and kindliness of purpose in all his relations with his fellow men.

GEORGE NIXON'S life had been a broad life in the best meaning of the term. He had seen and faced life from almost every angle.

He knew men and he knew the conditions under which his fellow men and women live. He himself had felt the depression of poverty and he had known the joy that comes from successful contest with men and affairs of moment. His own success had not estranged him from his less fortunate fellows.

He had after long years of struggle reached the top round of what the world calls success. In his own State, in banking, farming, mining, stock raising, and other forms of business activity he had taken first place and had twice received from the people of Nevada the highest testimonial of their trust and confidence by two successive elections to the Senate of the United States.

I am glad to have known GEORGE NIXON in a somewhat intimate personal relation.

His overflowing good nature, his cheery laugh, and friendly greeting betokened the kindliness of heart and sincere good-fellowship that permeated his whole life.

Not with formal words and phrases, but from a genuine appreciation of him and of his friendship, I pause to lay a wreath of real affection upon his bier.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is upon occasions such as this, when we are called upon to pause in our feverish rush and hurry in the active affairs of life and to take note of those things which have passed by forever, that there comes to us a realization of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death.

To those of us who have been Members of this body for any extended period the backward-turning thoughts upon these memorial days bring sad visions of many great statesmen—genial companions, firm friends—once here, who passed into the mysteries of another existence. As their forms and faces, their efforts and achievements, their failures and successes, their pleasures and sorrows are recalled to us in these quiet, memorial hours we realize, with the tent-maker poet—

Whether the cup with sweet or bitter run,
The wine of life keeps oozing drop by drop,
The leaves of life keep falling one by one.

Others have ably placed before the Senate the incidents of the useful and successful, but all too short career of our friend and colleague, the late junior Senator from Nevada, GEORGE STUART NIXON; and in joining in these memorial services I wish simply to testify to his sterling worth as a man, his loyalty as a friend, and his success as a useful representative of his State in the Congress of the United States.

The career of Senator NIXON reads like a page from the Arabian Nights, so rapidly did he rise from the position of a poorly paid telegraph operator at a remote railway station to a successful business man, mine owner, and banker, and to a place in this body—all of this being accomplished in a little more than 20 years. He rubbed the lamp of industry and—presto! Success opened her doors to him. His successful career not only is an evidence of his own industry and ability, but typifies the opportunities which our country offers to those who are prepared to grasp them. The same chances which enabled Senator NIXON to achieve success 10 to 15 years ago exist to-day in this country, and particularly in the Western States, where industry, honesty, and ability are as certain to bring rewards now as then. Hidden away in the vast mountain ranges of the West there are more Comstocks, more Leadvilles, more Cripple Creeks, more Goldfields to be discovered, and in plainer sight there are rich returns awaiting those who have the industry and the patience to seek them.

GEORGE S. NIXON was preeminently the business man in politics in the best sense of the term. Those who served with him in committees and were closely associated with him in his senatorial duties could well understand why he was a successful man. His word was as good as his bond. He came of that type of western man who would make bargains running into hundreds of thousands of dollars without the scratch of a pen and would then live up to them as religiously as if they were signed, sealed, and delivered .

He was genial and affable in his dealings with all who came in contact with him, whether below or above him in political rank. He was known to all his friends as the embodiment of good cheer, sunshine, and optimism. His jovial, bright smile has put out of the mind of many a man some trivial and vexatious thing, such as comes so often in our busy lives to harry or, possibly, to discipline us.

The fact that Mr. NIXON was a successful man in the financial affairs of the day made him none the less democratic in his dealings with his fellow men. He was extremely popular in his own State; and those interested in the political affairs of Nevada, of his own and of other political parties, have freely predicted that, had he lived, he would have been again returned to his seat in the Senate—Nevada following her custom of many years of retaining in office for long periods those who serve her.

Senator NIXON in a way was a representative of Wyoming, because for some years he held financial interests in that State. He was active in the support of every measure tending toward the welfare of Wyoming, as well as that of other far-western States.

He has gone from us and we have left only the sweet memory of a loyal, powerful, and big-hearted friend; a gracious and beloved comrade.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the popular impression of the work of a Member of the Senate does an injustice to many a valuable Senator. To be able to speak eloquently is a splendid qualification, but it is not a fundamental or essential qualification of a good and valuable legislator. The eloquent man may attract attention, he may gain the popular applause, he may get the credit for efficient work on behalf of the people, and yet the real legislative work is done in the seclusion of the committee room, where the quiet abilities are brought into play in the construction of legislation for the people's benefit. Hours of work and study in the office are spent in preparation for the consideration of measures in the committee and many of our most industrious, able, and faithful Senators seldom speak on this floor. The people may never really know their worth or their work, but their colleagues do.

Such a Senator was GEORGE NIXON. Seldom heard on this floor, his influence was potent in committee work. He was regular and prompt in attendance and his knowledge of the subjects under consideration showed the painstaking care he had given them. His judgment was excellent, his experience varied, and his honesty of thought and purpose evident to all. His counsel was wise and conservative. He was a modest man and courageous. His biography in the Congressional Directory was characteristic of his modesty and his action upon all public questions in committee and on the floor of the Senate showed his courage. He was a safe, honest, wise, careful, industrious legislator and guarded with scrupulous fidelity the interests of his State and Nation.

His life and success are another inspiration to our youth to aspire to great things. No greater opportunities came to him than come to the boys of to-day. He had no asset when he began life's battle that any young man may not have now. Industry, energy, frugality, honesty, and faithfulness brought him success as they will to the young men of to-day.

I had the good fortune a short time ago to talk with one who knew him years ago, when he was a telegraph operator, and it was good to hear him tell of his early struggles and triumphs. The same qualities that made him a good, wise, and faithful legislator made him a valued employee. He did his work as a telegraph operator well and faithfully. His employer's interest was his interest and as a result he passed from one position of trust to another, and by the judicious investment of his savings he soon became a most successful business man. With all his successes he was the same true, loyal friend as of old. Neither wealth nor position caused him to shun or forget the friends of his early struggles, and many of them bless him for his kindly aid to them or theirs when prosperity blessed him with its abundance. We admire his success in business, are proud of his achievements as a legislator, but our sweetest memory comes from our personal association and contact with those personal qualities which endeared him to all who knew him. He was kind, sympathetic, and considerate. He had a bright and cheery smile for everyone. His daily greetings reminded me of a few lines like these:

He always said, "Good morning,"
And emphasized the "good,"
As if he'd make it happy
For each one, if he could.
I often think and say,
That one of his "Good mornings"
Clung to you all the day,
And made you always cheerful
Just thinking of the sound;
It was always "Good morning"
'Long as he was around.

This little poem—not a classic but the simple expression of a feeling that comes to us from a kindly greeting—illustrates something of his beautiful inner nature which he expressed in action toward all those who came in contact with him. He saw and emphasized the good in all things; he tried to fill life with sweetness; he spoke approving, cheering words to the humblest as well as to the greatest. Nature gave him much of strength and those fair qualities of heart and mind which make a man beloved by his fellow men.

His life's work is ended. It was well done. Whether at humble tasks or lofty endeavor he was faithful and put forth his utmost ability. We treasure his memory as a precious heritage and his successes stimulate us to higher and loftier aims.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, by the irony of fate, at once strange and inscrutable, it seems to have been ordained that my first words upon the floor of this Chamber shall be uttered in eulogy of GEORGE S. NIXON. This is perhaps the more remarkable in that the last words he said to me on the occasion of our last meeting breathed the hope that at some time I might occupy a seat in this exalted body.

I do not shirk the task. On the contrary, I regard it as a duty that I owe to the memory of my departed friend, for I am conscious of the fact that he would gladly, if there can be joy in such a task, have spoken in my behalf had our conditions been reversed.

I can speak of Senator NIXON only as I knew him. My acquaintance with him was occasional, and yet very close. He was my friend. The currents of our lives flowed in the same channel once or twice, and again became widely divergent.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has given a brief account of Senator NIXON'S identification with what was generally known as the free-silver movement—the cause of bimetallism, as it was called by its friends. It was the activity of that great movement which first brought us in conjunction during the earlier period of the nineties, at which time the entire West, as one man, and regardless of party lines, entertained the abiding conviction that the cause was the embodiment of much that was absolutely essential to the welfare and permanent prosperity of this great Nation. I was one of the apostles of that movement, in the integrity of which I have believed as firmly in the days of its defeat as when it was a militant question in American politics. I speak of this because his convictions were the same, and they were always expressed with that earnestness and vigor which always characterizes sincerity and candor.

I met Senator NIXON in conventions and in conference rooms during what I may call the crisis of this great movement, and during all the stages of it which led up to that crisis. He was always at the front, a crusader in the cause, contributing to it of his time and of his means as freely as though it concerned him merely as an individual. But with the defeat of that movement, and its acceptance as an accomplished condition by those who advocated it, our lines of life were no longer identical.

Then arose the great mining excitement in southern Nevada, beginning with Tonopah, and still continuing its activities in several portions of the State. In 1896 I was summoned, in the capacity of counsel by Senator NIXON and by his associate, to look after some of their legal affairs in the great camp of Goldfield. This employment again brought me into close and intimate contact with Senator NIXON, a relation which continued until the close of the year 1908. It was during these years that I learned to know him well and to respect and love him more as a friend than a client.

Mr. President, there is no more severe test of a man's capacities or the lack of them than that which is applied by the rough-and-tumble civilization of a frontier mining camp. What a man is, whence he comes, whether he can boast a long line of ancestors, or is a mere waif upon the tides of humanity, all these count for nothing. Every man, indeed every human being, in these suddenly summoned aggregations of people is inspired by the desire to take advantage of the immediate occasion to secure as much as possible of that hidden wealth which has called them together. In that mad struggle every man stands for himself. Wealth counts only as it may give to its possessor an advantage over those who have it not; and the man who emerges successfully from these turbulent, exciting, exacting but just conditions must be a man indeed.

Senator NIXON has stood that test, has been tried by the crucible fires of that experience, not once but many, many times, and has risen triumphant upon the crest of each successive occasion. He was fortunate in that he was allied with a man—Mr. George Wingfield—destitute of the ordinary advantages which come to the American boy, but possessed of a native genius and talent that easily made him a master of men, a man of action as well as a man of affairs; a man of resolute determination and indomitable courage, whose characteristics so dovetailed into those of Senator NIXON as to make them an invincible team in the development of the mining affairs of the great State of Nevada. Such a copartnership should be sundered only by the hand of death.

I need mention only one incident in the career of Mr. Wingfield to indicate how truly he was entitled to the confidence and affection of Senator NIXON, whose long-time partner and associate he was. He was tendered the position of United States Senator as the successor of Senator NIXON by the governor of Nevada, but declined it because of his allegiance to those interests and business which had been confided to his keeping by friends and associates, and which might have been neglected had he accepted an appointment to that exalted position. He therefore declined it. Together they accumulated a great fortune, but they used it as great fortunes should be used, largely in the development of their native State, largely in assisting their local communities, and privately in extending aid to those needing and deserving it.

If it be true, Mr. President, that he who makes two blades of grass grow where but one grew before is a benefactor of humanity, then it must indeed be true that Senator NIXON was such a benefactor, for he performed this task manyfold, and the multiplied blades of grass that have sprung behind his pathway from obscurity to prominence and material success are many times multiplied beyond the accepted standards of man's experience.

His directness in matters of business always appealed to me. On one occasion he requested an opinion upon a matter involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. I spent much time and labor in preparing the opinion which he desired, but when presented he merely glanced at its conclusion. "That alone is what I am interested in," he said; "you are concerned with the reasons leading up to it; I accept the responsibility because you tell me that I am safe in doing so. If it should transpire that this is not true or that its truth should be challenged, yours then becomes the responsibility. I am too busy a man to concern myself with your reasons." That was a type of GEORGE S. NIXON.

In very truth a self-made man, born among the humbler ranks of the people, and rising through his own unaided efforts, step by step, to a seat in the Senate of the United States, he presents a most inspiring example, Mr. President, to the youth of this country.

I know nothing of the deceased Senator's domestic affairs except that his life in all things was clean and above reproach. On earth he was enlisted in the army of the industrial militants. To-day he is enrolled with the hosts triumphant.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it is a pleasure for me to add a brief but sincere tribute of respect and esteem to the memory of our late colleague, the Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON.

I was not acquainted with him prior to my entering the Senate in March, 1911, but upon coming here I was assigned to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which he was a member. In the work of that committee I came into quite close and intimate relations with him. I also saw much of him in this Capitol on the floor and in the lobbies.

Association with a member in committee gives a fairly just and correct idea of his ability and character as a legislator. It is there that his business qualities are demonstrated. His point of view, his insight into the nature and effect of proposed measures are discovered. There he is unembarrassed by the public gaze and uninfluenced by the thought of reporters or of criticizing colleagues. He is himself, and in the semiprivacy of the committee room he speaks and acts with freedom.

In the lobby we see the social and human side of Senators. There the student of human nature can discover the secret springs which move to action. Generosity, kindness, magnanimity, littleness, selfishness, envy, and the other characteristics of humans show forth in all their beauty or ugliness, and a lounging room is necessary to a right understanding of public men.

In the committee room I found Senator NIXON a clear-headed, far-sighted man. His varied and phenomenal business career gave him an experience which enabled him to comprehend broadly and quickly some of the great questions which were presented for consideration, and though diffident on the floor of the Senate, he did not hesitate in expressing his views before the committee, and his colleagues gave him careful attention.

In the lobby he radiated friendliness and good cheer. He despised hypocrisy and could vigorously express his disapproval. Modest himself, he could not endure the Pharisee, but he was always willing to award just credit where it was due. He was not envious.

I do not recall that I was ever formally introduced to him, but it seems to me that I knew him and felt his friendship from the very beginning of my service in the Senate.

The life of Senator NIXON shows the possibilities of the American boy. His short and modest biography in the Congressional Directory indicates that he lived and worked upon a farm in California until he was 19 years of age. His schooling was confined to the public schools near his home. At the age of 19 he entered the employ of a railroad company, where he learned telegraphy. In 1881 his company transferred him to Nevada, where he served as agent and telegraph operator for three years, at the end of which time he accepted a position as clerk in a Reno bank. In 1891 he was chosen a member of the Nevada Legislature, and in 1905 he was elected to the United States Senate from that State, and in 1911 he was reelected under the Oregon plan for another term of six years.

I know but little of his early life, but I assume that he was a poor boy and that his school education was limited, but I know his knowledge of men and affairs was great and that his varied experience fitted him to win the success, financial and political, which he achieved.

If I were called upon to give in detail a definition of a superior Senator I would be troubled to frame it. I could not say that it was the most eloquent one, neither would it be he who makes the most copy for the RECORD, nor would it always or generally be the man whose picture appears oftenest in the columns of the public press. On the other hand, silence and reticence are not unmistakable evidence either of wisdom or goodness, but it seems to me that the best legislator is the honest, practically intelligent man who is deeply impressed with the great responsibilities of service resting upon him and who fearlessly and conscientiously goes about his work having in mind his country's good and careless of his own.

I do not claim for Senator NIXON what he would not claim for himself, viz, that he was a great Senator. There are very few of such, many fewer than some Senators will admit. But he was a useful legislator, a true friend, and an honest man. His environment shut out some of the modern notions of political reforms, but according to his lights he performed his duty well, and his death took from this body a good Senator and from its Members a loyal friend.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, we meet to honor the memory of a departed associate, and in so doing we honor ourselves. Death is the most momentous of all earthly affairs. Birth, marriage, riches, fame, eminence, domestic affairs, business success, worldly honors, all the splendor, pomp, and glory of the world pale into utter insignificance beside the one short second when death lays hold on the mortal frame.

Alexander the Great conquered the world. Napoleon Bonaparte devastated nations. Julius Cæsar crossed the Rubicon. Christopher Columbus discovered a continent. The greatest of these achievements was as naught to the moment when the achiever's life fled. Xerxes at Thermopylæ, seated upon an eminence, viewing his glittering legions of infantry and chariots, forming in array of battle on the plain below, wept at the thought that all the glory and power there represented must so soon pass away and he and his ambition for conquest sink forever into oblivion.

Therefore great as was our departed associate, the late Senator NIXON, in generosity of heart, nobility of impulse, integrity of purpose, strength of character, devotion to principle; great as were his achievements in the commercial world and political circles; splendid as are the heights he attained; lovely as he was in all that goes to make a manly man; we are assembled here to-day on account of the most momentous phase of his physical existence—its termination. Death is always a grave matter, but the gravity thereof is brought to bear upon us with more impending weight and sterner reality than ever when we lose one whom we love and honor as friend and associate. I believe we do not fully realize the worth of those with whom we associate until they are gone.

In the short time that I was favored with the personal acquaintance of Senator NIXON, I did not have the honor of becoming an intimate friend and associate of his, but I learned greatly to admire and respect him. He was a most kindly disposed man. The generosity of his heart was striking. The kindliness of his disposition was unusual. The benevolence of his character was extraordinary. He was full of sympathy for his fellow beings. Ever ready to assist another, he always lent a kindly ear to those who appealed to him. Accommodating and affable, his store of help for human kind was inexhaustible. My association with him was most pleasant to me, and I feel that I am a better man for having known him. His temperament was typical of the broad and boundless West, of which he was an honored resident. Early in life identified with the West, he was imbued with lavish endowments of the heart analogous to the lavish endowments that favored section enjoys at the hands of nature. His rugged character was typified by the solid mountains based on the everlasting rocks. His loftiness of purpose was analogous to the towering peaks that pierce the clouds. His generosity of heart was as free as the dashing waterfall that courses down the mountain side. His greeting was as cordial as the kiss with which the morning sunbeam greets the smiling vale. His breadth of mind was like unto the broad and sweeping plains of his beloved West. We miss him here, but this body is better for his service in it. I enjoyed courtesies at his hands, and, while I probably did not, during his lifetime, as fully acknowledge them as they deserved, I take this occasion to pay a tribute, to the extent of my humble ability, to him and his worth.

The great French soldier, La Tour D'Auvergne, was the hero of many battles, but of his own choice he remained in the ranks. Napoleon Bonaparte gave him a sword and the official title of "First among the grenadiers of France." When he was killed the Emperor of France ordered that his heart be intrusted to the keeping of his regiment; that his name be called at every roll call, and that his next comrade each time answer: "Dead upon the field of honor." Thus we may regard our departed associate. His name will no more be called on the roll call of this body, but whenever it is called in our hearts we can answer:

Dead upon the field of honor.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have not prepared any formal eulogy upon the life and character of Senator NIXON, but I feel moved to express in unstudied words my appreciation of him as a man and a public servant, and in simple terms to pay the tribute to his memory that he deserves.

My personal acquaintance with Senator NIXON was comparatively brief; but I had known him for a long time, not only as a man in the public eye, but through mutual friends. When I came into the Senate I had the good fortune to be given a seat next to him in this Chamber. We had many things in common. He was a native of my adopted State. He loved California. He was interested in everything that was done in the interest of his native State. He was ready always to assist me as a new Senator in my efforts to represent the interests of the State that we both loved so much.

Shortly before his death I had the pleasure of visiting his home, and in that splendid home of his, furnished with all the luxuries that money could afford, and surrounded by the transcendent beauties of nature, he told us on that day the simple story of his early life. It was a life of privation and toil. It was an experience that taught him the valuable lessons of frugality, energy, and perseverance, which later on brought him fortune and fame.

One morning, very soon after that occurrence, he came into the Senate and said to me, "I am going to the hospital to-morrow." I expressed my surprise, for I regarded him as a man in perfect health, and I inquired what was the trouble. "Oh," he said, laughingly, "it is only a slight operation that I have to undergo." A very few days after that time I stood at his bedside in a little room in one of the hospitals of this city. He was unconscious and dying. His beloved wife was speeding to his bedside from their far western home; but she was too late. She met the remains of her husband at Chicago, and returned with them to deposit his body in his adopted State and among his friends.

His was a useful life. It was a life that might furnish a worthy example to every young man in this country. He was successful as a business man. He came into the Senate of the United States with a trained business mind. He was a capable, earnest, and sincere public servant. He was possessed of a genial, sunny, happy disposition that carried good cheer wherever he went.

Mr. President, a life like that is worth more to humanity than the ability to make and accumulate money. I believe that no one realized that fact more fully than Senator NIXON himself. With all his wealth he was a simple, kindly, loving man. I think he cared much less for the money that he had been able to accumulate through his energy, perseverance, and wisdom than he did for the good will and love of his fellow men.

He was a man who had accomplished much in a material way. His services here in the Senate were intelligent, wise, and honest. We may very well say in memory of him that he was a good citizen, a kind and loving husband and father, and an honest and capable public servant.

The resolutions (S. Res. 459) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the business of the Senate be suspended in order that proper tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, one year ago it was my sad duty to make formal announcement here of the death of Hon. E. H. MADISON. He was elected to Congress from the seventh Kansas district in November, 1906. In his service he won the hearts of his colleagues and was rapidly gaining high place among the leaders of the greatest legislative body in the world, the House of Representatives. He did not gauge legislation from the standpoint of a lawyer, but settled questions more as a judge, trying always to harmonize any differences which might exist. This fact arose from his experience upon the bench. He was recognized as one of the most fair and just judges who ever graced the bench in the district courts of Kansas.

He was born at Plymouth, Ill., December 18, 1865; was educated in the common schools of Illinois, and at the age of 18 years began teaching school; in 1885 moved to Wichita, Kans., and began the study of law in the office of G. W. C. Jones, and was admitted to practice in 1888; in the same year was elected county attorney of Ford County, Kans., and served two terms; was appointed judge of the thirty-first judicial district of Kansas January 1, 1900, which position he held until September 17, 1906, when he resigned to become a candidate for Congress; was married December 12, 1900, to Miss Lou Vance.

Mr. MADISON was a profound student of all questions before the people and, while he was a Republican, he could not be considered as radical. He was independent in his convictions and believed differences could be harmonized without resort to extremes. He was loved by those who knew him and there were thousands who mourned his death. Among his friends—and he had many—he was affectionately known as and called "Ed.," and he seemed to enjoy such informal recognition from those who were close to him. In his home life he was at his best and most tender and considerate in his family relations.

It was with the deepest satisfaction that Mr. MADISON entered upon the duties of his congressional office. I need not tell you of his able service in the House. His work speaks for itself. His death was unexpected and a shock to his family, friends, and neighbors. He had just returned to his home at Dodge City, Kans., and had spent but a day or two among his acquaintances, when he was suddenly stricken. His life went out, but he left us an example of how well we should live, for his character was too strong to yield to the allurements and weaknesses or overindulgences of luxury or wealth.

In the light of the life and example of Mr. MADISON, we refute any assertion to the effect that the days of honesty, of honor, of high ideals are over, and we may further assert that he has given us proof that the underlying moral firmness of character among our people assures the future welfare of the Republic.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, we stand on the bank of life's river and watch the mystic bark take from our shore its passengers on a voyage from which there is no return, and we are lost in speculation. The wisdom that takes the strong and leaves the weak, that takes the wise and leaves the foolish, that takes the pure and leaves the vile, that takes the good and leaves the bad, that takes the young and leaves the old is beyond our ken. The passengers have no choice. The why, the wherefore they are taken comes only at the end of the voyage. Those behind gaze upon a solemn mystery which each must solve alone with the dreaded boatman.

Judge MADISON was one of earth's choicest spirits. He was strong in body, brilliant in intellect, noble in character, great in high aims and lofty purposes. He was logical in thought, clear in expression, and courageous in following his convictions. Responsive to the popular will, he was nevertheless honest with himself and true to his settled convictions of duty. He loved his country with an intense love, and the welfare of its people was his highest aim. He was an ideal Representative, loyal to his people, faithful to his trust, able and fearless in expressing and advocating his views, and devoted to those policies which he believed to be for the good of all.

Taken in his prime at the very threshold of his usefulness by an all-wise Providence, perchance to a grander, nobler life, more suited to his great abilities and lofty ambitions, he has left to those who knew him an inspiration to greater and better things, and his life and achievements should stimulate the youth of the land to lofty endeavor and noble purpose. To have known him is a precious memory, to emulate him a nobler ambition.

"He belongs to the ages," thus wisely one said,
As they wept by his form when the spirit had fled.
Then the ages grew richer with treasure untold,
As the scroll of their pages before him unrolled,
And he lives in their life, an immortal sublime,
While the tides of eternity roll upon time.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, EDMOND H. MADISON was born on December 18, 1865, at Plymouth, Ill., and moved to Kansas in 1885. In his early life he was a school-teacher. While teaching school he studied law, and in 1888 was admitted to the bar at Wichita, Kans., and moved to Dodge City later in that year. Because of his unusual ability and admirable personal qualities he was elected the same year to the office of county attorney of Ford County, which was an unusual thing to occur in local politics. At that time he was only 23 years of age; it was the first year of his residence within the county and the first year of the practice of his profession. He filled the office with entire satisfaction, and two years thereafter was nominated and elected for a second term.

In the early days of his career he was known throughout the southwestern part of Kansas as the "boy orator." He had great personal popularity as well as fine oratorical talent, and was in great demand as a public speaker at all kinds of gatherings and especially in political campaigns. On January 1, 1900, he was appointed by Gov. Stanley to a vacancy on the district bench, which position he held until September 17, 1906. That year a redistricting of the State had resulted in the division of the seventh congressional district, and Congressman MURDOCK was taken out of the seventh district, which he then represented, and placed in the new eighth district, leaving a vacancy in the seventh. MADISON was easily the choice of the Republicans of this district for Congress, and was nominated and triumphantly elected. He was reelected in 1908 and 1910, and would still be representing that district in Congress if it had not been for his untimely death.

He was not only an able lawyer, but a wise legislator. He believed in the people and had a deep interest in their welfare. With a strong and brilliant mind he also possessed a warm heart. Nothing touched him more deeply than the struggles which the western Kansas farmer had gone through to reclaim the desert and transform its parched plains into fruitful fields. He could entertain his friends for hours telling stories of the struggles of different men whom he had known in the days of the early settlement in the southwestern part of our State. It was the highest ambition of his life to do something that would help these men and make life for them more successful and less burdensome.

In legislation he always sought to do that which he felt was right, and was also exceedingly eager to please his constituents. He felt keenly their criticism, and while the fear of it would not swerve him from what he believed to be his line of duty, yet it pained him very much to have any of them think that he had done the wrong thing. He was sensitive to the good opinions of his fellow men, but he would not sacrifice his conscience to obtain them. It seems to me that such qualities are of the highest order, and go to make up the ideal representative of a district of freemen in a legislative assembly.

He had brilliant intellectual qualities, clear and cool judgment, fine discriminating ability, and a sensitive conscience, and was possessed with a general affection for mankind. These very admirable traits of character made his duties at times burdensome and painful, yet they resulted in giving a direction to his official life that was wise and patriotic.

"ED." MADISON, as he was familiarly known, was a favorite in every community in his district. The people were always delighted to see him, and would assemble in large numbers at any place and upon any occasion where he was to speak.

The most conspicuous service that he rendered his country was in the Ballinger investigation. In that trying experience of his official life he discharged his duty with independence and without bias. He would not permit fear of political punishment or hope of reward to change his attitude on a matter of public concern, and during the months of heated factional strife which that investigation produced he held an even and steady course, and after the controversy was over his report was accepted by the country as an accurate portrayal of the facts and conditions in the case. It in truth determined the ultimate results of the controversy, and in this investigation he rendered a service of great value to his country.

He was one of my warmest political friends, and I feel very deeply his loss. His father was a Methodist minister and so was mine. Our boyhood days were cast in a similar environment and such experiences knit men closely together. I shall never forget the day of his funeral. The winds that swept the prairies seemed to mourn his loss. Cut off without warning in the prime of a brilliant and useful life, he left a sorrowing district, and the thousands that gathered to pay their last respect to their departed friend was the most effective evidence of the high esteem in which he was held.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 21, 1912.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL, late a Member of the House from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 460) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of Hon. ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, we are met here at this hour in respect to the memory of the late Hon. ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL, of the second district of Kansas, whose death occurred soon after he entered upon his duties as a Member of the Sixty-second Congress. In fact, his health was such that many of his friends thought it unwise for him to come to Washington to assume his office, but he had been elected and felt that his place was here, and came to do his part, and he did it faithfully to the end.

He was born at Cincinnati, Ohio, October 11, 1860; was educated in the common schools and the University of Kansas, graduating in June, 1889, with the degree of LL. B.; engaged in the practice of law at Lawrence, Kans.; was county attorney of Douglas County, Kans., for four years; member of the Kansas Legislature for four years and of the State board of law examiners three years; married Miss Helen M. Baldwin July, 1890.

His service in the House was too brief to give those who did not know him a view of his talents and his abilities. The earnest study which he gave to the great subjects of national legislation, the independence of view with which he surveyed the entire field, and the wisdom of his conclusions evidenced that with experience he would have been a valuable servant for the people who had so recently honored him at the polls. He was an able lawyer and had won an enviable position at the bar of Kansas. He had been a member of the legislature and had forged to the front as a leader, and it can be justly said that his public service previous to his entrance into the sphere of national legislation had been most useful and distinguished.

He of whom I speak was ever ready to battle strenuously for the things he thought to be right, yet always ready and willing to meet more than halfway those who disagreed with him and to settle questions for the best interest of all concerned. Mr. MITCHELL'S private life was clean, wholesome, honorable. His home life was ideal, happy, and pleasant, and with his death there has passed from his family, his friends, and the public a man of unblemished and noble character, a man of varied and marked abilities. He accomplished a great work in less than the full span of human life. In the State of Kansas, where his honors were won, his demise is universally regretted and deplored.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, an able lawyer, an experienced and useful legislator, successful in the administration of important and varied public duties, frugal and generous in business affairs, spotless in private character, a citizen of high standing and commanding influence in his community; at the age of 50 chosen to represent his congressional district in the National House of Representatives, and at the very threshold of a promising congressional career stricken with a fatal disease he passed away.

This briefly tells the story of the attainments of ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL. Why one so well equipped to serve, possessing character, industry, intelligence of a high order, and superb moral worth should be taken, while millions who do not possess such a combination of noble attributes are left, is one of the inexplicable mysteries of human existence.

Mr. MITCHELL was elected to represent the second Kansas district in Congress in November, 1910. He received a large majority for that district, much larger than was usually given to the Republican candidate. He enjoyed in a high degree the confidence of the people. They believed in his integrity and had faith in his ability. They loved him and trusted him. He was permitted to serve them but a short time, yet those of us who knew him well can fully realize the great loss they sustained in his death.

He was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, in October, 1860, came to Kansas when a young man, and began life in his adopted State as a farm hand. By his own efforts he acquired a good education, graduating from our State university in June, 1889. He began the practice of law in Lawrence the same year and soon became one of the leaders at the bar and continued to hold a high position in his profession until his death. He was honored by the people of his county by being elected as their county attorney for two terms, was chosen twice to represent his district in the State legislature, served as regent of the State university for six years, and was a member of the State board of law examiners for three years. In 1890 he was married to Miss Helen M. Baldwin, and she and three children mourn the loss of a devoted husband and a kind father. While no plummet line of sympathy can fathom the depths of their grief, yet thousands of friends yearn to help them bear their burden. With a deep and abiding sorrow I bow with them in their great affliction, for the death of "ALEC" MITCHELL was to me a personal bereavement. He was my intimate friend. We were about the same age and started our political life together in the same community. When I was elected to a seat in this body he presented my name to the Kansas Legislature. The mutual joy which that day brought us both no fitting phrase can properly express. I knew him well for 25 years. For a quarter of a century we worked side by side in the fierce political conflict that was waged in Kansas for better government. In that struggle he was always on the firing line. Able in counsel, cool in judgment, and vigorous in action, he bore well his part in every battle.

I feel his death more deeply than words can express. When he passed away I lost a beloved friend and a wise counselor whose place can not be filled. But not only was his death a great loss to his intimate personal friends, but a disaster to his district, from which it will not recover for years to come. We loved him, we mourn his loss, and with fortitude submit to the inexorable decree of an all-wise Providence whose judgments are good, and though we can not now understand them we know that they are wise, and we patiently wait for the unfolding of the years to reveal His purpose in visiting upon us this great affliction.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 461), as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR and GEORGE S. NIXON and deceased Representatives EDMOND H. MADISON and ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 10, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 8, 1913.

The House met at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who holdest the stars to their courses and fillest the earth with glory and maketh it yield abundantly to the labor of Thy children, guide us, we beseech Thee, as a people, by the light of Thy wisdom, the strength of Thy might, the justice of Thy judgment, the purity of Thy holiness, the benevolence and kindness of Thy love, that peace, prosperity, and good will may reign supreme; to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DIRECT ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the secretary of state of the State of Michigan:

FEBRUARY 6, 1913.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing herewith a certified copy of senate concurrent resolution No. 2, approving the concurrent resolution of Congress of the United States relative to an amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct election of United States Senators.

Very respectfully,

FREDK. C. MARTINDALE,
Secretary of State.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HAY, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 28699) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second times and, with the accompanying papers, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. (H. Rept. 1478.)

Mr. MANN reserved all points of order on the bill.

H.R. 17593

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 818.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider H. R. 17593 with committee amendments reported from the Judiciary Committee. That the bill shall be read and the Speaker recognize Members to offer amendments to the bill allowable under the rules of the House, and amendments so offered shall be considered pending. That there shall be three hours general debate on said bill, one-half of the time to be used by those favoring the bill and the remainder by those opposed to the bill; that at the expiration of this time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage, and the House shall proceed to vote without intervening motion on the amendments, if any, and the bill to final passage, except one motion to recommit, as provided by Rule XVI, paragraph 4.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, are we not entitled to 40 minutes' debate?

The SPEAKER. If anybody wishes to debate it; but the Chair did not see any gentleman rise. There will be 40 minutes' debate, 20 minutes to be under the control of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and 20 minutes under the control of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the bill H. R. 17593 is well known to every Member of this House. This session is drawing to a close, and the Committee on Rules felt that the time had come when it should act and that the House should be given an opportunity to vote on this important measure. For that reason House resolution 818 was reported from the Committee on Rules. The committee has sought to be fair with respect to this resolution; it has given reasonable time to debate and has not sought to cut off amendment.

The Committee on Rules felt that unless some resolution of this kind was reported there would be no opportunity for consideration of this important measure during the session of Congress. That is the reason the committee offers for bringing in the rule—a reason which the committee thinks entirely sufficient.

Mr. SHERLEY. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him when was this bill reported?

Mr. POU. From the Judiciary Committee, I think, within the last day or so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was it not reported yesterday?

Mr. POU. I think it was.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know when the report of the majority was available?

Mr. POU. I think yesterday.

Mr. SHERLEY. At what time?

Mr. POU. Perhaps about midday.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was not able at that time to get a copy of it. Does the gentleman know whether there is now available a report of the minority? There has been quite a diversity of views over this bill, and does not the gentleman think the House ought to have a little time to read and study the views of the majority touching the constitutionality of the proposed measure?

Mr. POU. My answer to that is that, speaking for myself, I believe that every Member of this House is in a position at this time to vote on this rule and within the next day to vote on the House bill 17593. The gentleman from Kentucky is well aware of the fact that this matter has been pending in Congress for a long time—that it has been discussed throughout the country and in the newspapers.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would suggest to the gentleman that the discussion in the newspapers throughout the country would not be very enlightening as to the purely legal aspects of the case. I have given a great deal of time to the subject, which is one of a great deal of difficulty. I should have liked an opportunity to study the report of the committee, and I say that in perfect good faith.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this time to discuss the merits of the bill referred to in the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules, but I would like to make some observations with respect to the parliamentary situation and as to the zeal and efficiency of the Democratic majority in control of the business of this House.

This is the 8th day of February, and the Congress will expire by limitation of law on the 4th day of March. If I have counted correctly, there are between this and the expiration of the session 23 days. Of those 23 days 4 are Sundays, and unless the House contemplates carrying on business on Sunday that reduces the working days to 19. There are two days mortgaged for special business in the intervening time, one of them Wednesday next for the counting of the electoral vote, by concurrent resolution of the House and Senate, and the following Saturday for the memorial services of the late Vice President SHERMAN. That reduces the working days to 17. There will be one intervening Monday which is mortgaged for unanimous consent and suspension of the rules business. That reduces the working days to 16. The last six days of the session are devoted not alone to motions to suspend the rules, as they were previously under the rules of the Republican Congresses, but they are mortgaged to the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar as well as to suspension of the rules. Deducting those 6 days you have 10 days left—10 working days of this session in which to complete the business of this House!

What is that business? In the first place, there is not a single, solitary conference report on any of the appropriation bills that has been passed upon by this House. All the conference reports on all the appropriation bills that this House and the Senate may be able to pass in the intervening time will have to receive the consideration of the House. There is a public-building bill to be considered, if we may give credence to popular rumor. There are remaining to be considered by this House the following great appropriation bills: The agricultural bill, the diplomatic bill, the Military Academy bill, the naval appropriation bill, the pension bill, the deficiency bill, and the sundry civil appropriation bill—all to be considered within the limit of 10 days.

I had made for me yesterday a statement of the time occupied in the consideration of these bills in the last session of Congress, and I find that the agricultural bill was taken up on the 27th day of February and finished on the 12th of March, the diplomatic bill was taken up on March 26 and finished March 28, the Military Academy bill on May 28 and finished May 31, the naval appropriation bill on May 23 and finished on May 28, the pension bill on January 30 and finished on February 2, and the sundry civil bill took from June 4 to June 21; in all, 42 days.

I do not contend that all of those 42 days were occupied in the consideration of these bills, because there was intervening business, but there will be intervening business in the consideration of these remaining seven bills now, and as against those 42 days occupied in the consideration of the bills you have left for their consideration in the remainder of this session 10 days.

How comes it, Mr. Speaker, that we have this great moral spasm at this juncture of the session? How comes it that this bill, which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] says in no new matter relates to a subject that has been pending in this Congress and in previous Congresses, must needs be taken up at this time? How comes it that no report came from the Committee on the Judiciary on that bill until yesterday? Why, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules adopted this rule before the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary had been printed and before the report of the Judiciary Committee had been printed, before the minority of the committee had had an opportunity to file their views. I say, how comes it that we have this great moral spasm at this juncture of the dying Congress? How much glory does it reflect upon the efficiency of a Democratic majority to conduct the business of this House? If we are going to have legislation by special rule, which shall take away the time that ought to be occupied in the consideration of appropriation bills, I ask is this the most important bill as to which we should have a special rule? There was introduced into this House on the 8th day of May, 1912, nine months ago, a bill that had been considered, deliberated upon, and passed by the Senate and which has been reported to this House, which is of most pressing importance to a great body of the people of this country, that is deserving, in my judgment, if not of more, at least of equal consideration by the membership of this House. I refer to what is known as the workmen's compensation act. Yet the Committee on Rules has steadfastly refused to report any rule not only with respect to that bill but with respect to any bill to which its attention has been called during the last two weeks of this session. There was currently reported and published in the public press a statement of the chairman of the Committee on Rules that no legislation would be authorized by that committee by way of special rule until the appropriation bills had been disposed of. Do you intend to dispose of the appropriation bills at this session, or do you intend to let them go over until the special session, to be disposed of then by the House controlled by your great majority, and thus to interfere with that great reform for which the country is so anxious—the revision downward of the tariff?

I submit, first, that there is no justification for a special rule for any legislation at this time outside of the appropriation bills; and, second, that if there be such justification, there is other legislation, there are other bills calling for enactment on the calendar that ought to take precedence or at least be put on an equality with this bill. And I submit that this is only another evidence of the fact that when history comes to record the story of this Congress it will pronounce this the most incompetent and useless Congress that ever sat under the dome of the Capitol. [Applause on the Republican side.] I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing surprising in this proposed legislation and, I take it, but little surprising in this rule. This proposed legislation has been discussed in the public press by the constituents of every Member of this House and by the Members themselves. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but it has been before the House and before the Congress in one form and another repeatedly for about the last 20 years, and therefore I am warranted in saying that there is nothing which should astonish the gentleman who opposes this measure. Elaborate hearings were given on bills affecting the interstate shipment of alcoholic liquors by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives of last spring and summer. Every man who had any views to express had an opportunity then to appear and give his views. The committee has given much consideration to this subject, and the result of that consideration is what is known as the amended Webb bill. The Webb bill is the Sheppard-Kenyon bill improved in phraseology and improved, I think, in the matter of constitutionality. The Webb bill differs from the Sheppard-Kenyon bill, so called, in that it does not undertake to destroy property rights in alcoholic liquors as the Sheppard-Kenyon bill did.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said that this rule was brought in here shortly after the bill was reported. That is true, but up to that time, Mr. Speaker, I have heard no complaint from any member of the Committee on the Judiciary on that account. They seem to have acquiesced in the belief that the minority had ample opportunity to present their views, at least they have made no complaint, and it remained for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to register that complaint.

I think the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary can take care of their views and their wishes in this or any other matter, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, unless the minority members of that committee should have asked for further time to prepare and present their views, I see no occasion for delay in this matter at this time. The committee has been burdened by communications for and against this measure. The mail of every member of the committee has been burdened with petitions, letters, and protests, and I think that sufficient consideration has been given to this measure. I agree with the gentleman from Texas that the matter having been considered, the time has arrived for action, and the particular phases of the question bearing upon its constitutionality can be discussed in the time fixed by the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this special rule, and I am opposed to special rules setting aside any portion of the remaining days of this session for the consideration of business other than the appropriation bills until the appropriation bills are finally disposed of. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has reviewed the number of days remaining to be devoted to public business and the bills to be considered in that time. Six general appropriation bills have passed the House; seven still remain to be disposed of in the 12 days available for work. It must be remembered that while about 12 days remain, 12 days do not remain for consideration of these bills by the House. They must be sent to the Senate sufficiently early to enable the Senate to consider and to dispose of them and to permit the managers representing both Houses to adjust the differences between the two Houses. The responsibility, Mr. Speaker, for the failure of the appropriation bills at this session will fall upon this side of the House; it can not be shirked. I do not know what the intention of the majority is. Last Wednesday, after a careful analysis of the situation, I moved to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday. I did so because I was aware that there was a purpose to call up for consideration a bill that everybody realized had absolutely no chance of passing this House; that the so-called Panama or San Francisco Exposition, or lame-duck, bill could not pass this House once it was explained to the Members. It was a day wasted.

Every member of the majority who has charge of an appropriation bill, with the exception of one gentleman who was absent attending the marriage of one of his children, voted for that motion. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the responsible leader of this House, voted against the motion. Everybody realized how pressed we were for time.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if there be any understanding or arrangement or disposition among those high in the councils and in the control of the party to defer the passage of the appropriation bills until the extra session, but I do say that in justice to myself and to the men who have the drudgery of preparing these bills, and who sit long hours in session with the House attempting to pass them, often to the impairment of their health—if there be any such disposition or understanding or arrangement, we should at least be notified of it. It is unfair to ask us to spend 10 hours a day in committee, to work at night, and be required to watch the business of the House at the same time, and then not have the support in our efforts to transact public business of the men whom this side of the House have placed in positions of responsibility.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like but one minute more, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will yield.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No one expects this bill to become a law. Why not be frank about it? Nobody dreams it will be enacted into law at this session of Congress, but in order to give men an opportunity to mislead the country into the belief that we want it to become a law, the day is to be wasted.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not.

The work is being piled up so as to make it physically impossible for the business of the country to be properly transacted. The naval bill, with all the great questions involved in it; the sundry civil bill; the deficiency bill, aggregating twenty to twenty-four millions of dollars; the diplomatic bill; the Agriculture bill; the pension appropriation bill, carrying $180,000,000, all wait to be considered by this House, and yet one day is squandered upon an exposition bill to take care of men who are, at the desire of their constituents, preparing to retire to private life, and one day is to be devoted to this bill, which everybody here knows can not receive consideration in the Senate before the expiration of this session.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I appeal to Members on this side who want to do business and who do not wish to fool the public to vote down this resolution.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that this House proceed to do business and not indulge in squandering time and fooling the public. We are in condition where the calendars are badly clogged, but the reason for it, and the only reason for it, is the grossest mismanagement of appropriation bills on the part of the majority in this House. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said that he moved last Wednesday to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, and he did, but if the gentleman was so anxious to conserve time, why was it that afterwards, when the agricultural bill was reported, unanimous consent was given for three hours of general debate upon the bill, and, with the exception of one speech, not one word was said in that general debate on the merits of the bill? Was that any effort to conserve the time of the House and expedite business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The request for time came from the other side of the House, in trying to accommodate minority men.

Mr. LENROOT. But the gentleman made no objection. In the last three appropriation bills we have had seven and one-half hours of general debate, and everything has been discussed in that general debate except provisions of the appropriation bills. Further, Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of the appropriation bills under the five-minute rule there has been the grossest waste and mismanagement of time. We all remember on the District bill, only two or three days ago, that we consumed two whole legislative days on one proposition, and at the end of the two days' debate the House found it had traveled in a circle and reached a point exactly where it commenced two days before.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this House is to take the position that at short sessions of Congress we shall have no general legislation except such as the Committee on Appropriations chooses shall be considered, then we might as well make up our minds that at short sessions of Congress we will consider nothing but appropriation bills.

I am for this rule, because by my vote I want to serve notice upon the Committee on Appropriations and upon the Democratic majority that they must, if they want their appropriation bills to go through, conduct these matters in some sort of business fashion, instead of in the way they have been doing in the past. [Applause.] And, Mr. Speaker, if they will do that we will have ample opportunity not only to consider this bill, but to consider other bills of great importance to the country.

I know, Mr. Speaker, and every other Member of this House knows, that there are bills upon the calendar now that the country is very much more interested in than they are in extended discussions over some little hundred-dollar item in an appropriation bill. We all know that hour after hour has been wasted upon very trivial matters, and now they say that because of that waste of time we have not time to consider bills of great national importance. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I have four minutes remaining, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Is the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] going to have more than one speech over there?

Mr. POU. We have just two short speeches on this side.

Mr. DALZELL. Only one gentleman over here wants to speak.

Mr. POU. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for three minutes.

[Mr. GARRETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] that since I spoke to him a moment ago a gentleman on this side wants a minute, and I yield to him. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY] one minute.

Mr. POU. The gentleman has only one speaker after that?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MCCOY. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be considered as speaking in opposition to this rule necessarily, but I do want the House to know this one fact: The chairman of the committee said that the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary who joined in a minority report had made no complaint. Our minority report is printed, but has only just now come into the hands of the Members of the House. We were given to understand that we might have 10 days' time, if we chose to take it, in which to submit our report before this bill should be brought up for consideration, but our time was shortened by the action of the Rules Committee.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman, if he will yield——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCOY. Yes.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman that I hold a copy of the minority report in my hand, so that it is apparent that it has already been printed.

Mr. MCCOY. Is that the report bearing the name of Mr. DAVIS?

Mr. POU. It is.

Mr. MCCOY. Then that contains the minority report, but has only just been received by the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield that time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is part of a flimflam game that is being played upon an unsuspecting public. [Laughter.] A bill only becomes a law when the bill passes both the House and the Senate. This bill is a House bill. It may pass the House this afternoon.

It is within the knowledge of every Member here that the Senate by unanimous consent has fixed for consideration on Monday next a Senate bill on the same subject. The House can pass the House bill, the Senate can pass the Senate bill, and Members of both bodies can go home and say, "We voted for our bill"; the Members of the House laying the blame on the Senate for not passing the House bill, and the Members of the Senate laying the blame on the House for not passing the Senate bill. [Laughter.] If gentlemen really wanted to pass the bill into a law, they would wait with their order until they could provide consideration of the Senate bill in the House after it had passed the Senate, and gentlemen all well know it.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has already called attention to the condition of the appropriation bills. The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], chairman of the Committee on Rules, Attorney General in the next Cabinet [applause], special representative of the President elect on the floor of the House, is, as it seems to me, doing everything he can, probably inspired from the source of authority, to prevent the appropriation bills becoming laws at this session of Congress, in order that they may be taken up at the special session of Congress. Everyone knows that without special celerity these appropriation bills can not now become laws. Yet the gentleman proposes through the Committee on Rules to use up the time of the House, endeavoring to flimflam and fool the public, in order to take up time to prevent the appropriation bills becoming laws, knowing that this bill will not become a law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed pathetic to see the attitude of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in regard to the appropriation bills. There is no doubt that every appropriation bill will be passed at this session under his wise leadership. But, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the question of controlling and regulating the liquor traffic is as important as any appropriation bill. [Applause.] Permit me to assert to-day it is as vital and important as the life of the Republic itself.

No gentleman is surprised in regard to this legislation. The bill only proposes that liquors "intended to be shipped into States in violation of the laws of those States shall be prohibited." In other words, the States of the Union may exercise their sovereign power, the power they never surrendered. They retained the right to control the liquor traffic and to all matters of domestic concern and within the scope of police powers.

After long and exhaustive investigation it seems to me there is not the slightest doubt about the validity of this statute under the Constitution. Let me say to gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, many of you coming from Northern States, that years ago you appealed to Congress to allow you to refuse to surrender fugitive slaves and permit you to exercise the functions and rights of sovereign States. To-day we appeal to you to maintain the integrity of State laws, State governments, and the right of local self-government, "to let the people of every State control the liquor traffic as they see proper." [Applause.] That is the question involved here, and the rule only provides for the consideration of the bill. It is thrown open to amendment, with three hours for general debate, and I predict that the measure will pass this House practically unamended, because it is meritorious and justifiable from beginning to end.

The gentleman talks about "flimflamming the public." We do not intend to deceive anyone about the question. Ah, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY] says that those who are opposed to the bill have not had time to file their minority views. And yet I hold in my hand the views of the minority, signed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY]. There is nothing to justify surprise here to anyone.

Mr. Speaker, that is all there is involved in the question. Shall we allow the States to exercise their reserved powers and jurisdiction? Standing for State rights, the supremacy of the law, local self-government, and the integrity of the people's rule, I shall stand for this rule and the most righteous measure here proposed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were 157 ayes and 3 noes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 211, nays 60, answered "present" 9, not voting 101, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I find I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. DAVIDSON, and I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, has my colleague, Mr. PARRAN, voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. If he was present, I would vote "aye."

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, if I am entitled to vote I would like to vote "aye," but I was not here until the roll was nearly completed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill, under the rule just adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he does not think it is yet time to do that.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time provided by the rule for debate shall be equally divided; that I control one-half of it in favor of the bill and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], the writer of the minority views, control the half in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not here to-day.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania not being present, I will ask that the time in opposition to the bill be controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY].

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is opposed to the bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, Mr. MCCOY signed his name to the minority views, of which Judge MOON is the author.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he control the time, one hour and a half, in favor of the bill, and that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY], who joined in the minority views, control the other hour and a half against the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, under this rule all amendments will have to be discussed during the three hours, will they not?

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. MANN. If they are discussed at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he will direct the bill to be read, at the conclusion of which any gentleman who desires to offer an amendment may offer it before the debate begins.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, another parliamentary inquiry. The bill, then, will not be read a second time for amendment?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the bill must be read immediately.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under the rule, as I take it, after the bill is read, it is in order to offer amendments, but is it required under the rule that all amendments shall be offered at that time? May not a Member obtain the floor to offer an amendment at any time?

The SPEAKER. Of course; but in order to shorten the proceedings the Chair invites all gentlemen who have amendments to offer them as soon as the bill is read; but if any gentleman desires to defer offering his amendment until some other time, he has that right.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, or wine, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontinuous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited; and any and all contracts pertaining to such transactions are hereby declared to be null and void, and no suit or action shall be maintained in any court of the United States upon any such contract or contracts, or for the enforcement or protection of any alleged right based upon or growing out of such contract or contracts, or for the protection in any manner whatsoever of such prohibited transactions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that after the three hours of debate have been exhausted no one can then offer amendments, because the rule provides that the vote shall be taken at once.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, ought not the committee amendments to be read at this time?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I think they ought to be read now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "including beer, ale, or wine."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is not now in order to vote upon the committee amendments; that the rule adopted provides that amendments shall be considered as pending, with three hours of debate, and that then all amendments shall be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is eminently correct, and the Chair holds that that is an objection to voting on these amendments at this time.

Mr. SHERLEY. But not to reading them. It is perfectly proper that they should be read; but there would be no need of discussion if they are to be adopted in advance.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second committee amendment: Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "noncontinuous" and insert the word "noncontiguous."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NORRIS. I rise for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the Clerk has made a mistake. This is on page 1, instead of page 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk read the amendment correctly. The gentleman from Nebraska did not hear correctly. This is the second amendment, instead of the second page, which the Clerk read. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Do I understand the first committee amendment to have been adopted?

The SPEAKER. No; none of the amendments have been adopted. There has been no vote taken upon any amendment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I thought the Speaker was putting the question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk is reading these committee amendments for the instruction of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "or kept" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sold."

Page 2, line 9, strike out the following: "enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, and place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof."

Page 2, line 12, strike out the semicolon after the word "prohibited" and insert a period and strike out all the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 12, page 2, by striking out the period and adding "Provided, That nothing contained in this bill shall be so construed as to prevent any citizen of the United States from purchasing, ordering, or having shipped, or to prevent any common carrier or agent thereof from accepting, receiving, transporting, or delivering spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind in reasonable quantities when the same is plainly marked on the outside of the package 'For personal use': Provided further, That no common carrier or agent thereof shall make such delivery to any person, whether marked 'For personal use' or not, if the person ordering the same has been convicted of violating the prohibition laws of any county, State, or municipality, if the fact of such conviction appears of record in the courts of record in the county or parish where such shipment is to be delivered by the common carrier or agent thereof; or to any person who holds or possesses a Federal license or tax to retail spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind; or if the courts of record of any such county or parish show that the person ordering such spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind has been convicted of public drunkenness."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will mark that "Amendment No. 1."

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I send up an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, on page 2, line 12, after the word "prohibited," the following:

"And whoever shall knowingly ship, transport, or deliver to any common carrier for shipment or transportation, or shall knowingly cause, induce, or procure to be shipped, transported, or delivered to any common carrier for shipment or transportation from one State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontinguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, to any other State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, with intent to receive, possess, sell, or use the same therein, or to cause, induce, or procure the same to be received, possessed, sold, or used therein, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of the laws of such State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 or imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than 2 years, or both."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. We are going to be called upon to vote, at the conclusion of a certain length of time, upon all amendments pending. I think the House is entitled to know in advance of the discussion what the amendments are, and therefore I ask if the points of order that are reserved must not now be made?

The SPEAKER. Is the query of the gentleman whether they must be made or reserved?

Mr. SHERLEY. Whether a point of order can be reserved. Otherwise we may have discussion on a lot of matters pending and then they may go out on a point of order. If this is a serious attempt to debate a really great proposition, it ought to be so the House can consider it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that it has been the universal practice for any Member to do exactly what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not in order to reserve a point of order on an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think if the gentleman demands the regular order the point of order would have to be disposed of, Mr. Speaker, although I had hoped to have an opportunity to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of that impression, too.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I say that I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not insist upon that, and that it is my purpose to allow a vote on these particular amendments? I agree with the suggestion made by the Chair a while ago that the amendments be offered and that any gentleman who wants to make a point of order against an amendment may have an opportunity to do so when the amendment is before the House for action.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, perhaps, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is unable to control the action of the House touching points of order. I do not feel that this House at this time in the year ought to undertake to discuss matters that may not come before it in a legislative way; and, without desiring in any way to embarrass matters, I submit to the candor of gentlemen that we ought not to have a lot of amendments pending here and have them discussed in good faith on the theory that they may be voted on and then have them ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in all candor that when an amendment is reported from the floor in the House we ought to have an opportunity to examine it under this rule before it is determined whether it is subject to a point of order or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman. I had nothing to do with this arrangement.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] demands the regular order, the Chair rules these amendments have got to be passed on at the time or that there has to be a point of order made.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do insist that points of order shall be considered when made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia on the ground that it is not germane to the pending bill. It is a bill which undertakes to confer certain rights and jurisdictions upon the various States of the Union, and does not in any wise provide for any penalty inflicted by the United States. It only purports to provide that when liquor is shipped from one State to another it shall be subject, in general language, to the laws of the State where it is found. Now, it does not seem to me that adding a penalty to be inflicted by the United States is germane to that proposition at all, but is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained, from the expression of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to conclude that he has not read my amendment, which is printed with the views of those who favor it, for this bill, regardless of whatever name may be ascribed to it, and regardless of whatever force gentlemen may think it will have, purports on its face to be a declaration by Congress that certain things shall not be done. In its original form, as it came to the committee, there was attached as the penalty for so doing the nullification of certain contracts. The committee struck out that penalty, believing it to be utterly impossible in law, and the amendment proposed is to insert a penalty, in the customary form, which will make effective the prohibition Congress is asked to declare. I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is entirely germane to the purpose, object, and language of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while I am perfectly clear in my own mind that the amendment offered by the gentleman is not germane to the bill, and certainly not germane to that portion of the bill that undertakes to provide that contracts shall not be enforceable, and while I am clearly of the opinion that it is not a practical provision to be enforced by the United States, yet in order that the matter may be submitted to the House I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his point of order.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer a second amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I renew the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] renews the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard. This bill undertakes briefly to declare that a shipment made in interstate commerce when the intention of anyone connected with that shipment is to violate a State law shall be prohibited. Now, as was well said by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS], that is a declaration of policy on the part of the Federal Government. It is by this bill announcing that it proposes to prevent the interstate shipment of alcoholic liquors wherever anyone connected with it intends to violate a State law.

Now, personally I am opposed to that legislation. But if it is to be passed, if the United States Government is to lay down a rule, manifestly it is in the power of the Government, and it is within the legislative power of this House, to attach to that provision a penalty for its violation. Can it be said that when we provide—and that is in substance what the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia does provide—that whoever does violate this act shall be punished, that that is not germane to the act proposed.

The language proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia seems intricate because of the necessity of defining what is interstate commerce by describing it as commerce between one State and another or Territory, and so forth. But the amendment is simply a proviso that anyone who violates the body of the act shall be punished.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on this point of order. There is no question whatever in the mind of the Chair but that this amendment is germane to this bill. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offered another amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, was I not recognized on my second amendment at the time the point of order was made? I sent to the desk a second amendment, and understood I was recognized by the Chair for that purpose. The amendment is now in the Clerk's hands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was recognized for one amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I know; but a point of order intervened.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible to be recognized on two amendments at the same time.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] offered an amendment to be known as No. 1. Are we to understand that the Davis amendment is to be No. 2?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and this Bartlett amendment is to be known as No. 3, unless it is ruled out of order. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of the bill, on page 2, the following: "Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed to render illegal or subject to State control the interstate shipment of liquors herein defined into any State or Territory or District to anyone for his personal or family use."

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer a second amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of the bill the following: "But nothing in this act contained shall be construed to forbid the shipment or transportation of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind intended for sacramental purposes or for the personal use or consumption of the owner or consignee thereof."

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] offers an amendment to the second Davis amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the Davis amendment add the following:
"Unless such shipment or transportation is contrary to the local law of the place of delivery."

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 8, add at the end thereof the following:
"Provided, That the courts of the United States shall have no jurisdiction to issue any injunction or restraining order against any State or county officer acting under the color of his office, or in any suit in which the good faith of any act of such officer is challenged."

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Where is that amendment offered to come in?

Mr. JACKSON. On page 2, line 8, at the end thereof, as stated in the amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. CLAYTON. I suggest that the gentleman put it at the end of the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. I thought the intervening matter was stricken out.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Helgesen amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out everything after the enacting clause and substituting the following:

"That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, or wine, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State or Territory and before delivery to the consignee, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise."

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] for an hour and a half; but before he begins the Chair desires to state that at the conclusion of this three hours' debate no amendment will be in order. The Chair does not want anybody to complain or say that a snap judgment was taken on him.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is not any Member of the House at any time, under the rule, before the end of the three hours' debate, entitled to recognition for the purpose of offering an amendment?

The SPEAKER. That is true; but at the end of the three hours the vote will be taken.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to move to amend by striking out, on page 1, lines 4 and 5, the words "any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind" and substitute therefor "any article of commerce"; and on page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors" and substitute therefor the words "article of commerce."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Sherley amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind" and insert in lieu thereof "any article of commerce."

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order against that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not reserve a point of order. He can make it. If the gentleman from Alabama wants to make a point of order, he must make it now.

Mr. HOBSON. I retire in favor of the gentleman in charge of the time, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I have not made a point of order against this or the other amendments, because I thought that under the parliamentary situation if I made a parliamentary proposition it would prolong the discussion before we got into the merits of the bill, and I want the House to have the opportunity to consider any amendment that may be offered at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that anyone who wants to talk about these amendments must do it in this three hours' debate under this special rule.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLAYTON. At the end of the debate, when an amendment is submitted, will it then be in order to make a point of order against it?

The SPEAKER. You will have to make it now, unless you get unanimous consent then.

Mr. MANN. It is too late to make it now, after discussing it, is it not?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is not too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold that it is not too late.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against all amendments at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that. If either gentleman from Alabama wishes to make a point of order against this amendment, he must do it now or hold his peace.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the point of order is, and then I would like to be heard.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not true that the Clerk has not completed the reading of the Sherley amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is true, and the Clerk will proceed and complete the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors" and insert in lieu thereof the words "article of commerce."

The SPEAKER. And against that the gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order.

Mr. RODDENBERY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is the time consumed on these points of order to be taken out of the three hours' general debate?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not discuss it, Mr. Speaker, until I know what the point of order is.

Mr. HOBSON. I make several points of order, Mr. Speaker, and the first is that it is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will overrule that point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. I will make another point of order, that it is not germane. I do not desire to enter into a discussion, but I do mean to say that the question of forbidding interstate commerce generally under these conditions has no legitimate bearing on the question as to commodities generally that are not in the prohibitory class under the laws of individual States; that the injection of that into this bill where States have laws against liquor shipments is not germane.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to argue the point of order at length, but if the gentleman from Kentucky will indulge me in order that the gentleman from Kentucky may have all the points before him, I would like to submit a brief addition to the point of order as stated by the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will give the gentleman a chance if he does not rule that way after the gentleman from Kentucky has got through.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, as far as I can translate the statement of the gentleman from Alabama, his objection that the amendment is not germane is based upon the ground that the bill is dealing with a particular subject and I am undertaking to introduce other subjects.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman is introducing other matter that is not in the same class as the matter in question. He is introducing matter that is not prohibited by law, when we are dealing with matters that are prohibited by law.

Mr. SHERLEY. To that the answer is that it is not so. I am not doing anything of the kind. To treat the gentleman's point of order seriously, Mr. Speaker, the bill that is before the House undertakes to prohibit the shipment of "spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind," when the intention of anyone to the transaction is to violate the State law. The amendment offered by myself undertakes to substitute for the designation of various kinds of liquors the words "any article of commerce."

Now, my amendment, if it should be adopted into the bill, would have the effect of prohibiting the interstate shipment of any article where the intent is to violate a State law. In order that the Chair may fully understand the purport of it, let me illustrate by a concrete case. Suppose, as happens in a good many States, it is against the law to sell cigarettes; the effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to prevent anyone through the medium of interstate commerce violating any State law by the interstate shipment of cigarettes. If the State law was the same in regard to the sale of pistols, the effect would be to prevent a violation of that law through the medium of interstate commerce. I know what will be suggested by those who are really familiar with the rules touching parliamentary practice, and that is that it is not possible where a matter deals with a given subject to bring in other subjects, but the point that I submit to the Chair is that this bill does not deal with a particular subject. It does not deal with whisky alone, it does not deal with beer alone, it does not deal with wine alone, but it deals with various articles of interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Kentucky this question: Is not the whole subject matter of this bill the interstate shipment of intoxicating liquor, whether it be called whisky, beer, or what?

Mr. HOBSON. A beverage containing alcohol, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. SHERLEY. Answering the Speaker's inquiry, I must say both yes and no. It does in the sense that I think every enumerated class here is a class of intoxicating liquors, but in the sense that the Chair suggests that it is one article of commerce, distinctly no. Whisky is an article of commerce distinct from beer, and not even a legislative determination can make them the same. Wine is an article of commerce distinct from whisky. I submit the rule has always been that when you are dealing with two classes it is proper to bring in a third.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. And where you are dealing with only one class you can not bring in a second.

The SPEAKER. Yes; you may bring in absinthe or anything that would make a man drunk.

Mr. SHERLEY. In my judgment there is not a word that would warrant the statement that this is simply limited to one subject. It says "spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind," but there are many kinds, and to limit it and to say that we are dealing with only one subject matter, when the bill says we are dealing with four or five articles of commerce, is not tenable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman if the subject matter of this bill is not the interstate shipment of intoxicating liquors—that is, the intoxicating liquors that are mentioned in the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I think that is true, but I do not think it is true in the sense the Chair wants me to say it is true, that it is only one article. I think there are many articles.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the parliamentary learning and for the ability of the gentleman from Kentucky, but I desire to call his attention to the fact that this question has been settled by the present occupant of the chair. The Chair will remember that when the cotton-gambling bill was up for consideration, to prohibit gambling in cotton futures, it was sought then to add grain to that bill, and the Chair distinctly ruled then that the subject matter being gambling in cotton futures the addition of grain or other commodities to it was not germane to the original purpose of the bill, and did not allow the amendment. I say here that there is but one commodity dealt with in this bill and that commodity is in the language of the bill, "or other intoxicating liquor." It deals with nothing except intoxicating liquor in one form or another, and I may say that——

Mr. SHERLEY. Is this still a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is all right, but I just want a chance to answer the gentleman's question. I am obliged to the gentleman for the illustration he uses, because nothing could better clarify the matter. That was a case where the law dealt with a specific thing, cotton. It did not deal with cotton and wool, things that go to make clothing. If this bill dealt with a particular thing like beer, the case would be entirely on all fours; but it deals with beer and whisky, which go to make intoxication, just as wool and cotton might go to make clothing. The illustration that the gentleman uses, instead of sustaining his position sustains the position that I have taken, that we are dealing with several subjects. The gentleman says that the bill is as if the only words in it were "other intoxicating liquor." I can not believe that, because I can not believe that the great Judiciary Committee would have reported a lot of useless words in the bill, and evidently they felt there was some need of the specification of all the classes; and for fear they might overlook a class, after enumerating every one they could think of—vinous, spirituous, malt, fermented—then they took a general hold and said "other intoxicating liquor." But for us to legislatively declare that we are dealing with but one subject is to deny what every man's own knowledge tells him, and that is that those are different articles of commerce.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not bother the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON (continuing). I will simply say, Mr. Speaker, I did not go into an elaboration on this point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman need not go into it now. It is clear as crystal to the mind of the occupant of the chair that the whole subject matter of this bill is to prevent the interstate shipment of anything that will make a man drunk into dry territory where it is prohibited by the local law, and it treats of no other subject. They might go on and enumerate more kinds of intoxicants, although any one of these words in here are superfluous about "spirituous, vinous, malted, and fermented liquors," provided you retain the words "intoxicating liquors" in it. But the gentlemen who drew the bill chose to put in certain specific sorts of intoxicants. It would be perfectly competent to amend this bill, although it would be superfluous, by putting in absinthe or pulque, or any other stuff that will make a man drunk. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Sabath amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, after the word "spirituous," in line 4, page 1, the following words: "Vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating," so that it will read: "That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of spirituous liquor of any kind from a State or Territory," etc.

On page 2, line 1, strike out, after the word "spirituous," the words "vinous, malted, fermented, or other."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The point of order is that the amendment is not germane to the purposes of the bill, the purpose of the bill being to divest intoxicating liquors of an interstate-commerce character in certain cases. If the amendment is in order, it destroys the purpose for which the legislation is proposed in that all "intoxicating liquors" is a more comprehensive and inclusive term than "spirituous liquors," and all spirituous liquor is but one of a class of intoxicating liquors.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Strike out the word "intoxicating" wherever it appears before the word "liquor."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is subject to a point of order, but, of course, I hope the House will not agree to it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right to discuss this amendment until he takes the floor.

The SPEAKER. That is absolutely true, and the gentleman was not discussing——

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; he was discussing it before he took the floor.

The SPEAKER. If he was doing anything at all with reference to it, he was sustaining the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. He was discussing the amendment and hoped the House would not agree to it.

The SPEAKER. Well, that is finished.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am sorry to have offended the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for an hour and a half.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill, if it be amended in accordance with the suggestion of the Committee on the Judiciary, will read:

That the shipment of any spirituous * * * or other intoxicating liquor of any kind from one State * * * into any other State, * * * which said spirituous * * * or other intoxicating liquor is intended by any person interested therein to be received, possessed, or sold, or in any manner used either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State * * * is hereby prohibited.

I have quoted the substance of the bill, omitting words which are unnecessary for the remarks which I desire to make to the House.

An examination of this bill shows that it has for its purpose the simple object of preventing persons, liquor dealers, if you please, and others from promoting the violation of State laws restricting the use or prohibiting the sale of intoxicants. If the contrary of what is asserted in this bill was suggested in any form, there is not a man here who would agree to it. Suppose the bill were to say that any man shall have the right to ship into any State liquor for the purpose of violating the State law; it would have no defender here.

By this bill it is sought to remove an impediment against the enforcement of the State law. That is all this bill seeks to accomplish. It is in behalf of the right of a State to enforce its own laws, and seeks to take from any person engaging in unlawful traffic in liquor the protection which is now afforded him by the commerce clause of the Constitution.

The friends of this bill have never claimed that it proposes to deny to any man the right to have liquor sent to him for his own use, because no State has prohibited the personal use of intoxicating liquors, nor has any State forbidden the use of wine for sacramental purposes. Therefore it seems that liquor shipped for these two purposes can not be said to be—intended * * * to be received, possessed, or sold, or in any manner used * * * in violation of any law of such State.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think there are some State laws under which it would be legal to ship liquor into certain territory, no matter for what use?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman's view of that. If it is for his personal use, I am inclined to think it is so.

Mr. SHERLEY. The express law of my State already prohibits the shipment from a "wet" county to a "dry" county.

Mr. CLAYTON. Perhaps so; and if that be so, that argument can be made, Mr. Speaker, by referring it to the sovereign State of Kentucky to manage the situation.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I also understand it is the law of Alabama now. If the gentleman does not desire to prohibit shipment for personal use, would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment provided it also had the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, that it should not be a violation of the local laws?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will say in reference to that, the committee considered that quite carefully and rejected it, and the committee was of the opinion that this bill in its present form ought to pass as we have presented it to the House, with the committee amendments, and that it was unnecessary for us to agree to any further amendments. And, standing here in charge of this bill and speaking for the committee, I shall insist in behalf of the committee on the passage of this bill as it came from the committee, without any amendment except the amendments proposed by the committee and referred to in the report which has been read. [Applause.]

I do not think the gentleman from Kentucky ought to complain because some of us desire to put "dry" counties in other States upon an equality with "dry" counties in Kentucky. If the Legislature of Kentucky does not want whisky made in a "wet" county in Kentucky sold in a "dry" county in Kentucky, why should whisky distillers or dealers in Kentucky claim the right to ship their whisky, made in Kentucky, into a "dry" county in another State?

Let me repeat that no State has denied to its citizens the right to have intoxicating liquors for their own personal use and consumption. The Supreme Court of the United States in Vance v. Vandercook (170 U. S., 452) said:

But the right of persons in one State to ship liquor into another State to a resident for his own use is derived from the Constitution of the United States and does not rest on the grant of the State law. Either the conditions attached by the State law unlawfully restrain the right or they do not. If they do, and we shall hereafter examine this condition, then they are void. If they do not, then there is no lawful ground of complaint on the subject.

Associate Justice White, now Chief Justice, said, in Pabst Brewing Co. v. Crenshaw (198 U. S., 17):

In so far, however, as the State law imposed burdens on the right to ship liquor from another State to a resident of South Carolina intended for his own use and not for sale within the State, the law was held to be repugnant to the Constitution, because the Wilson Act, whilst it delegated to the State plenary power to regulate the sale of liquors in South Carolina shipped into the State from other States, did not recognize the right of a State to prevent an individual from ordering liquors from outside of the State of his residence for his own consumption and not for sale.

Mr. Caldwell, the lawyer who was the first to suggest the form of this bill, said in the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House:

I contend in the same way Congress might so regulate commerce as to take away this right for personal use. But, speaking for Oklahoma, I say to you that we are not asking that, because down there we are prohibitionists of this sort—we are prohibitionists because we are opposed to the traffic and the institution of the saloon. We do not berate the man just because he uses, in a decent way, intoxicating liquor, although, speaking for myself, I am a total abstainer. But we believe that if the use of intoxicating liquor had at all times been confined to the home—personal use in the home—there never would have been the question of prohibition.

So that primarily we prohibit the sale of those things in order to strike down that traffic—the open saloon and its attendant and kindred evils. If the time should ever come when, in order to protect the morals and the public welfare of the State of Oklahoma, it should, in the opinion of the legislative power of the State, become necessary to prohibit the personal use of intoxicating liquor, who ought to have the right to exercise that power—the Congress of the United States or the State of Oklahoma? We say that Congress has nothing to do with that question, and that it is none of Congress's business whether the people in the State of Oklahoma shall drink liquor, have it in their homes for their personal use, or whether they shall sell it.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is not the business of Congress whether the people of Oklahoma or any other State shall possess or not possess liquor in their homes for their own personal use or have it for eucharistic celebrations.

I now quote what was said by Rev. E. C. Dinwiddie, the legislative representative of the Anti-Saloon League, before the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate:

Mr. DINWIDDIE. Now, I will say to the doctor, for his information, along the line of the point that the court has said that that is a constitutional right—and he and I will not have any argument about that—that it is a constitutional right for a man in one State to have shipped to him alcoholic liquors from another State. It is his right to receive those liquors. The Wilson law simply has the effect of preventing his selling them in unbroken packages if the law of his State forbids it. But that constitutional right that Dr. BARTHOLDT speaks of is the same constitutional right the Supreme Court held in the Bowman case and the Leisy v. Hardin case—was the right not only to receive in the original unbroken package, but the right to sell in the original unbroken package, the State law to the contrary notwithstanding. They used the same language then, saying it was a constitutional right. Congress took away by direct legislation the constitutional right the man had to sell liquor in the original package, if he received it through the channels of interstate or foreign commerce. That is a correct statement, which I am ready to rest upon before any committee of lawyers or anybody else.

Representative BARTHOLDT. Not at all. That was not a constitutional right at all——

Mr. DINWIDDIE. The Supreme Court said so.

Representative BARTHOLDT. Under the decison of the Supreme Court it was decided to be a constitutional right to receive an interstate shipment. In other words, an interstate shipment is not delivered until it is delivered to the hands of the consignee. But the very moment it leaves the hands of the consignee the State law goes into effect, and that is why I have always argued that this legislation is unnecessary, for the reason that as soon as a consignee receives a shipment of liquor and tries to dispose of it by sale or otherwise the State law is in effect, and you can prevent him from doing it without any law enacted by Congress.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. I am free to say that if the constituents of the doctor and those who buy their products for sale were men who would absolutely obey the laws of their States we would probably not need this legislation; but the keepers of blind tigers and speak-easies all over the country, at whom exclusively this legislation is aimed, do not always respect the law—and I rest on the language of the bills for this statement. I say that a plain, careful reading of that bill can not give anybody the impression that we are trying to prevent by congressional legislation the importation or use of intoxicating liquors for family or personal use.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he does not think the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] should be adopted, making a penalty for the violation of this law?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think it should be adopted at this time. I have told you plainly that I do not think it wise to agree to any amendment other than those agreed upon by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right in line with the one that has been asked.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the gentleman think if what is known as the "Davis amendment," providing that a penalty is to be put on, making it a tax on the shipper of intoxicating liquor, that it would practically kill this legislation?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am afraid it would, Mr. Speaker. It would hazard the passage of this bill, and I do not think it is wise to weigh this bill down with such provisions as that. We have brought here a single proposition. Some of these bills introduced heretofore on this subject have stated that the liquor shall be subject to the State laws when it shall have arrived within the boundaries of the States. This bill proposes a positive law saying that any liquor shipped into a State to be used in violation of a law of the State is prohibited. I am indoctrinated somewhat with the old State rights idea, and I believe, when the police power of the State and the commerce power of Congress come in collision in that narrow field where sometimes it is difficult to determine whether one falls under the police power or under the commerce power, that it is a part of wisdom on the part of Congress to concede the power of the State or remove the impediment to the exercise of the police power of the State, especially when the State says that laws it has enacted in the interest of public health and public morals are being violated by the protection afforded by the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do.

Mr. JACKSON. I want to ask the gentleman relative to the matter that is covered by my own amendment, as I will not have a chance to discuss it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the gentleman will be brief, as I have allotted to others most of my time.

Mr. JACKSON. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks, if this law is passed—and I am going to vote for it that way—the Federal courts will have jurisdiction to enjoin State officers attempting to do their duty under the local law?

The gentleman is aware, of course, that it was thought necessary to put a provision similar to the one that I have offered in the interstate-commerce law to prevent that sort of thing. I have had some experience in these matters myself, and I see no reason why the litigants could not go into the Federal court and get a blanket injunction against the county attorney or sheriff's attorney, even after the passage of this law, and that is the reason why I offered my amendment. I want to know what the gentleman thinks about that proposition.

Mr. CLAYTON. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that that proposition was never called to the attention of the committee, either by the friends or the opponents of this bill. I have but one matured opinion upon this subject, and that is I want to pass this bill, word for word, as the committee has reported it, without adding anything to it or subtracting anything from it. The friends of the measure want it in this form, and it has been considered and debated in the committee and in the hearings, and we do not wish to hazard its enactment into law by the addition of anything else. Perhaps it may become apparent hereafter that this is not perfect legislation. If so, it then will be the time for Congress to go further. But at this time I would not favor any amendment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will yield for one question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman has stated that he is in favor of State rights. Does not the gentleman think that if the prohibition States would use their rights in the direction of the enforcement of their laws this legislation would be absolutely unnecessary?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, I think not. I think that if they were to do their best you would still find the "blind tiger" and the "bootlegger" doing business under the protection that is afforded to them by the commerce clause of the Constitution. We want to remove that impediment as far as we can, and that is the object of this legislation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And is it not true, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as a shipment is delivered into the hands of the consignee, the moment the consignee attempts to dispose of it by sale or otherwise the State law goes into effect?

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, I hope the gentleman will take his own time. The gentleman on this side [Mr. McCOY] will give him time. That is a perfectly legitimate argument, if the gentleman sees fit to use it, but it can have no persuasive force on me, and none, I think, on the friends of this measure. Perhaps when the gentleman takes the lecture platform he can discuss that phase of the question. [Laughter.] In any case where liquor is intended to be sold in violation of the State law, it is desired that the State shall have the unhampered power to seize such liquor before it is delivered to the consignee.

Mr. Speaker, I shall reserve a few minutes to close the debate on this measure. In the meantime I shall accord to several gentlemen brief time to advocate this bill. I shall avail myself of the opportunity of extending my remarks by having printed in the RECORD a part of the report which I had the honor to make for the Committee on the Judiciary on what was then known as the Hepburn-Dolliver bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress, second session. It will be remembered that the Hepburn-Dolliver bill passed the House of Representatives in the Fifty-seventh Congress, but failed in the Senate. I voted for that measure. It will also be remembered that the Littlefield form of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill was favorably reported to the House in the Fifty-ninth Congress, but those of us who voted to report that measure, including the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Littlefield, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and myself, were unable to have that bill considered in the House.

I quote from the report which I presented in the Fifty-eighth Congress, April 8, 1904, as follows:

> Now let us consider the real purpose of this bill, the step which it takes in advance of the act of August 8, 1890, namely, the removal of the impediment to the subjection of intoxicating liquors transported from one State into another to the police regulations of the latter State upon arrival within its boundaries before and after delivery of such liquors.
>
> It is worth while to review briefly as may be some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States construing the commerce clause of the Constitution—the Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.
>
> It may be noted that every argument made in behalf of the exclusive power of Congress over interstate commerce, in cases where there is apparently the slightest conflict between untrammeled interstate commerce and the police regulations of a State, recites or assumes the well-established fact that one of the most potent inducements which led to the formation of the Constitution was the commercial confusion that existed in the country when the States were separate and independent.
>
> While this historical fact is admitted there is another historical fact that ought not to be forgotten, and that is that the police power of the States is older than the commerce clause of the Constitution, and was never surrendered by the States to the Federal Government, but was reserved to the States by the very nature of the Constitution, and afterwards declared by the adoption of the tenth amendment to have been reserved because not granted away.
>
> There has not been a more perplexing problem presented to the Supreme Court of the United States from time to time than the question of what a State may do or may not do in given cases affecting interstate commerce more or less. The police power of the State is limited to the jurisdiction of the State; but within such jurisdiction and for State or local purposes it is a plenary power.
>
> The control of Congress over commerce, essentially foreign or interstate, is exclusive. The first case in which it is claimed that there was a conflict between this reserved power of the State on the one hand and this exclusive power of the Congress on the other hand is the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1), but this decision there went no further than to declare that a State regulation of foreign or interstate commerce in conflict with the Federal statute was void.
> It was decided in Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 419) that the statute of Maryland requiring importers of foreign goods to pay a license tax for the sale of such goods was invalid because repugnant to the provision of the Constitution which denies to the States the power to lay a tax on imports or exports, and also because such a tax was hostile to the commerce clause.
>
> In Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. (2 Pet., 245) the State law authorized the company to construct and maintain a dam across Blackbird Creek, a navigable stream. The law was attacked upon the ground that it was in hostility to the commerce clause. It was upheld upon the ground that Congress had not "passed any act which bore upon the case; any act in execution of the power to regulate commerce."
>
> In New York v. Miln (11 Pet., 102) a State law was held to be valid which required every master of a vessel arriving in the port of New York from any port of another State or nation to make a report to the mayor of the name, place of birth, and last legal settlement, age, and occupation of every person brought as a passenger by the vessel on her last voyage. This law was held to be the rightful exercise of the police power of the State.
>
> In the License cases (5 How., 504) the constitutionality of the liquor laws of certain States was involved. In one case Pierce had been convicted in New Hampshire for selling liquor without the license required by that State, and the liquor was a barrel of gin bought in Massachusetts, brought coastwise into New Hampshire, and there sold in the original package. These State license laws were held to be constitutional.
> In this case Chief Justice Taney said:
> "Upon the whole, therefore, the law of New Hampshire is, in my judgment, a valid one. For although the gin sold was an import from another State and Congress have clearly the power to regulate such importations under the grant of power to regulate commerce among the several States, yet as Congress has made no regulation on the subject the traffic in the article may be lawfully regulated by the State as soon as it is landed in its territory, and a tax imposed upon it, or a license required, or the sale altogether prohibited, according to the policy which the State may suppose to be its interest or duty to pursue." (46 U. S., p. 585.)
> In the Passenger cases (7 Howard, 283) the laws of the States of Massachusetts and New York, requiring masters of vessels to pay to the health officers of the State courts a certain sum for each passenger landed, were condemned for the reason that they were regulations of foreign and interstate commerce and conflicted with the exclusive power of Congress over the subject.
> In Cooly v. Board of Wardens (12 Howard, 299) the law of Pennsylvania regulating pilots and pilotage for the Philadelphia Harbor was considered and held to be constitutional. It was there said:
> "Whatever subjects of this power [the power of Congress over foreign and interstate commerce] are in their nature national or admit only of one uniform system or plan or regulation may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress."
>
> And it was held, further, that in case of pilotage, until Congress should exercise its power, it was left to the States for regulation, and—
> "That it is local and not national, that it is likely to be best provided for, not by one system or plan or regulation, but by as many as the legislative discretion of the several States should deem applicable to the local peculiarities of the ports within their limits."
>
> In Bowman v. Railway Co. (125 U. S., 465) it was held that the law of Iowa forbidding common carriers to bring intoxicating liquors into the State from any other State or Territory without being first furnished with a certificate under the seal of a certain designated officer, certifying that the consignee or person to whom it is to be transported or delivered is authorized to sell liquor, was essentially a regulation of commerce among the States, affecting interstate commerce in an essential part, and not having been sanctioned by the authority, expressed or implied, of Congress, was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.
> In Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) the case of Pierce v. New Hampshire was expressly overruled. It was held that the law of Iowa prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, except for pharmaceutical and other specified purposes under a license, was unconstitutional when applied to a sale by the importer of liquor in the original package, such liquors having been manufactured in and brought from another State. This case overturned the doctrine in Pierce v. New Hampshire, which had been supposed for 50 years to be the law. Prior to the decision in this case no one believed that the consignee had the right to sell intoxicating liquors shipped from one State into another State in violation of the police regulations of the State to which they were shipped.
> But in this case it was held that a citizen of one State had the right, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to import intoxicating liquors into another State and to sell the same in the original packages, and that without the consent of Congress the State into which such liquors were imported was without authority to prohibit or regulate the sale of such liquors while they remained in the original packages. The State having a high-license law, a local-option law, a dispensary law, or a prohibition law was powerless to enforce the same in the case of the sale of liquors in the original packages.

In Leisy v. Hardin, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, quoting from Bowman v. The Railway, said:

"For the purpose of protecting its people against the evils of intemperance, it (the State) has the right to prohibit the manufacture within its limits of intoxicating liquors. It may also prohibit all domestic commerce in them between its own inhabitants, whether the articles are introduced from other States or from foreign countries; it may punish those who sell them in violation of its laws; it may adopt any measure tending, even indirectly and remotely, to make the policy effective until it passes the line of power delegated to Congress under the Constitution. It can not, without the consent of Congress, express or implied, regulate commerce between its people and those of the other States of the Union in order to effect its end, however desirable such a regulation might be."

Again the Chief Justice quotes from the License cases (5 Howard, 504), as follows:

"It has indeed been suggested that if a State deems the traffic in ardent spirits to be injurious to its citizens and calculated to introduce immorality, vice, and pauperism into the State, it may constitutionally refuse to permit its importation, notwithstanding the laws of Congress; and that a State may do this upon the same principles that it may resist and prevent the introduction of disease, pestilence, or pauperism from abroad. But it must be remembered that disease, pestilence, and pauperism are not subjects of commerce, although sometimes among its attendant evils. They are not things to be regulated and trafficked in, but to be prevented as far as human foresight or human means can guard against them. But spirits and distilled liquor are universally admitted to be subjects of ownership and property, and are therefore subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic, like any other commodity in which a right of property exists. And Congress, under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, may prescribe what article of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded, and may, therefore, admit or not, as it shall deem best, the importation of ardent spirits. And inasmuch as the laws of Congress authorize their importation no State has a right to prohibit their introduction."

The Chief Justice in the same case, in Leisy v. Hardin, says further:

"Hence, inasmuch as interstate commerce, consisting in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities, is national in its character and must be governed by a uniform system, so long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate it, or allowing the States so to do, it thereby indicates its will that such commerce shall be free and untrammeled. * * * The conclusion follows that as the grant of the power to regulate commerce among the States, so far as one system is required, is exclusive, the States can not exercise that power without the assent of Congress."

To avoid the effect of this decision and to remove an obstacle resulting from the exclusive control of Congress over commerce among the States, preventing the full operation and effect of the police regulations of the States in regard to intoxicating liquors, Congress passed the act of August 8, 1890, which is hereinbefore set out in this report. It was enacted—using the language of Chief Justice Fuller—"simply to remove an impediment to the enforcement of the State laws in respect to imported packages in the original condition created by the absence of a specific utterance on the part of Congress." In other words, this act is in pursuance of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and was held not to be a delegation of this power to the States, but the exercise by Congress of a power confided to Congress. It is not disputed that Congress can not delegate such a power for any purpose whatsoever, and it is equally well established that any act of Congress which invades the reserved province of the police power of the State under a mere pretext that interstate commerce is in some sort affected is without constitutional authority and void.

In Gibbons v. Ogden, Chief Justice Marshall declared in substance that although Congress can not enable a State to legislate, it may adopt the provisions of a State on any subject, such as pilotage and the like. It has done this in the case of a State system for the regulation of pilots. And Congress has passed laws requiring the Federal courts to conform in practice and procedure to the rules of the State courts. Further illustration is perhaps unnecessary.

The Wilson law, which we have set out, was held to be constitutional in the case of In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545). In the opinion in this case Chief Justice Fuller states:

"The laws of Iowa under consideration in Bowman v. Railway Co. (125 U. S., 465), and Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), were enacted in the exercise of the police power of the State, and not at all as regulations of commerce with foreign nations and among the States, but as they inhibited the receipt of an imported commodity, or its disposition before it had ceased to become an article of trade between one State and another, or another country and this, they amounted in effect to a regulation of such commerce.

"Hence it was held that, inasmuch as interstate commerce, consisting in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities, is national in its character and must be governed by a uniform system, so long as Congress did not pass any law to regulate it specifically, or in such way as to allow the laws of the State to operate upon it, Congress thereby indicated its will that such commerce should be free and untrammeled, and therefore that the laws of Iowa, referred to, were inoperative, in so far as they amounted to regulations of foreign or interstate commerce, in inhibiting the reception of such articles within the State, or their sale upon arrival, in the form in which they were imported there from a foreign country or another State. It followed, as a corollary, that when Congress acted at all, the result of its action must be to operate as a restraint upon that perfect freedom which its silence insured.

"Congress has now spoken and declared that imported liquors or liquids shall, upon arrival in a State, fall within the category of domestic articles of a similar nature. Is the law open to constitutional objection?

"By the first clause of section 10 of Article I of the Constitution certain powers are enumerated which the States are forbidden to exercise in any event, and by clauses 2 and 3 certain others which may be exercised with the consent of Congress. As to those in the first class, Congress can not relieve from the positive restriction imposed. As to those in the second, their exercise may be authorized, and they include the collection of the revenue from imposts and duties on imports and exports by State enactments, subject to the revision and control of Congress, and a tonnage duty, to the exaction of which only the consent of Congress is required. Beyond this Congress is not empowered to enable the State to go in this direction. Nor can Congress transfer legislative powers to a State nor sanction a State law in violation of the Constitution; and if it can adopt a State law as its own, it must be one that would be competent for it to enact itself and not a law passed in the exercise of the police power. (Cooley v. Port Wardens of Philadelphia, 12 How., 299; Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall., 610, 623; United States v. Dewitt, 9 Wall., 41.)

"It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State. This being so, it is urged that the act of Congress can not be sustained as a regulation of commerce, because the Constitution, in the matter of interstate commerce, operates ex proprio vigore as a restraint upon the power of Congress to so regulate it as to bring any of its subjects within the grasp of the police power of the State. In other words, it is earnestly contended that the Constitution guarantees freedom of commerce among the States in all things, and that not only may intoxicating liquors be imported from one State into another without being subject to regulation under the laws of the latter, but that Congress is powerless to obviate that result.

"Thus the grant to the General Government of a power designed to prevent embarrassing restrictions upon interstate commerce by any State would be made to forbid any restraint whatever. We do not concur in this view. In surrendering their own power over external commerce the States did not secure absolute freedom in such commerce, but only the protection from encroachment afforded by confiding its regulation exclusively to Congress.

"By the adoption of the Constitution the ability of the several States to act upon the matter solely in accordance with their own will was extinguished and the legislative will of the General Government substituted. No affirmative guaranty was thereby given to any State of the right to demand as between it and the others what it could not have obtained before, while the object was undoubtedly sought to be attained of preventing commercial regulations partial in their character or contrary to the common interests. And the magnificent growth and prosperity of the country attest the success which has attended the accomplishment of that object. But this furnishes no support to the position that Congress could not, in the exercise of the discretion reposed in it, concluding that the common interests did not require entire freedom in the traffic in ardent spirits, enact the law in question. In so doing Congress has not attempted to delegate the power to regulate commerce, or to exercise any power reserved to the States, or to grant a power not possessed by the States, or to adopt State laws. It has taken its own course and made its own regulation, applying to these subjects of interstate commerce one common rule, whose uniformity is not affected by variations in State laws in dealing with such property.

"The principle upon which local-option laws, so called, have been sustained is that, while the legislature can not delegate its powers to make a law, it can make a law which leaves it to municipalities or the people to determine some fact or state of things upon which the action of the law may depend, but we do not rest the validity of the act of Congress on this analogy. The power over interstate commerce is too vital to the integrity of the Nation to be qualified by any refinement of reasoning. The power to regulate is solely in the General Government, and it is an essential part of that regulation to prescribe the regular means for accomplishing the introduction and incorporation of articles into and with the mass of property in the country or State (12 Wheat., 448).

"No reason is perceived why, if Congress chooses to provide that certain designated subjects of interstate commerce shall be governed by a rule which divests them of that character at an earlier period of time than would otherwise be the case, it is not within its competency to do so.

"The differences of opinion which have existed in this tribunal in many leading cases upon this subject have arisen not from a denial of the power of Congress when exercised, but upon the question whether the inaction of Congress was in itself equivalent to the affirmative interposition of a bar to the operation of an undisputed power possessed by the States.

"We recall no decision giving color to the idea that when Congress acted its action would be less potent than when it kept silent. The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of a subject matter specifically committed to its charge. The manner of that disposition brought into determination upon this record involves no ground for adjudging the act of Congress inoperative and void."

Notwithstanding the fact that the act of August 8, 1890, was held to be constitutional, the purpose of the act and the efficacy of the police powers of the State were at least greatly impaired by the decision in Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 415). The statute of Iowa made it unlawful to bring intoxicating liquors into that State except when accompanied with a specified certificate to the effect that the consignee was at the time authorized to sell such intoxicating liquors in the county where it was to be delivered, which certificate the Iowa law provided should be granted under particular and exceptional conditions. It will be observed that the act of August 8, 1890, subjected such liquor to the State law upon arrival in such State.

The liquor shipped in the Rhodes case, and for which certificate was demanded, was shipped from Dallas, in the State of Illinois, to Brighton, in the State of Iowa; and it may be further observed that this law of Iowa in regard to such certificate was held to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. In this case, in defining the scope of this act, the court held that under its provisions liquors transported from one State into another remained under the protection of the interstate commerce laws until they were delivered to the consignee and that, therefore, the State law was inoperative to reach them until after they were delivered by the common carrier to the person to whom they were consigned. As we have said, the effect of this decision was largely to emasculate the act of August 8, 1890, so far as the transportation and delivery of intoxicating liquors within the State was concerned.

Under the law, as thus construed, dealers in intoxicating liquors located in some of the States established agencies in other States, and sent out their soliciting agents, who traveled over and canvassed the country, and solicited sales and took orders for intoxicating liquors to be shipped in by the principal, consigned to the subscribers—sometimes to be sent to them direct, and in other cases to be sent to them in care of the soliciting agent.

By this method the business of selling intoxicating liquors by the foreign dealer has been kept up in many of the States with impunity and in defiance of the laws of the State and community where the liquors are delivered. Under this system and the existing congressional action the States are entirely powerless to exercise any control or regulation over such sales. They can not even impose a license or any restrictions whatever on the business carried on in this manner.

To summarize, we may say that Leisy v. Hardin held that the State could not interfere with liquor shipped into it from another State as long as it remained in the original package. The act of August 8, 1890, above cited, was a regulation or assent by Congress that the laws of the States might operate in specified cases or upon particular articles of commerce earlier than the State laws could have operated without such regulation or assent of Congress. The constitutionality of this law was upheld, as we have said, in the case of In re Rahrer. The Rhodes case held that the laws of Iowa could not operate upon the liquor shipped from Illinois until it had gone into the State of Iowa, and even not then, in the absence of congressional legislation, until the goods had been delivered to the consignee in Iowa. We quote from the case as follows:

"The claim is, however, and it is upon this ground that the court below rested its judgment, that under and by virtue of the provisions of the act of Congress of August 8, 1890 (ch. 728, 26 Stat. L., 313), the ruling in the Bowman case is no longer apposite, as the effect of the act of Congress in question was to confer upon the State of Iowa the power to subject to its statutory regulations merchandise shipped from another State the moment it reaches the line of the State of Iowa, and before the consummation of the contract of shipment by arrival at its destination and delivery there to the consignee. And it is to this question that the discussion at bar has mainly related, and upon which a decision of the cause really depends.

"It is not gainsaid that the effect of the act of Congress was to deprive the receiver of goods shipped from another State of all power to sell the same in the State of Iowa in violation of its laws, but while it is thus conceded that the act of Congress has allowed the Iowa law to attach to the property when brought into the State before sale, when it otherwise would not have done so until after sale, on the other hand, it is contended that the act of Congress in no way provides that the laws of Iowa should apply before the consummation by delivery of the interstate-commerce transaction. To otherwise construe the act of Congress, it is claimed, would cause it to give to the statutes of Iowa extraterritorial operation, and would render the act of Congress repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It has been settled that the effect of the act of Congress is to allow the statutes of the several States to operate upon packages of imported liquor before sale." (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545.)

For the purpose of this report it is perhaps not necessary to review the decisions, other than those we have mentioned, or to endeavor to reconcile conflicting theories that have been discussed in the determination of particular cases. To students of the history of our jurisprudence there is no more interesting field than the opinions and dissenting opinions rendered in the numerous cases construing the commerce clause of the Constitution. Perhaps we may properly, in the consideration of this bill, remit the question of the exclusive power of Congress over interstate commerce and the concurrent power of Congress and the State in certain cases, affecting in some degree interstate commerce, to academic discussion. Your committee is of the opinion that the constitutionality of this bill can be rested upon principle and the lately adjudicated cases. We find that in Bowman v. Railway Co. it is stated:

"So far as these regulations" (certain acts of Congress concerning transportation) "made by Congress extend, they are certainly indications of its intention that the transportation of commodities between the States shall be free, except where it is positively restricted by Congress itself or by the States in particular cases by the express permission of Congress. * * * It" (a State) "can not without the consent of Congress, express or implied, regulate commerce between its people and those of the other States of the Union," etc.

In Leisy v. Hardin it was said:

"Hence, inasmuch as interstate commerce, consisting in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities, is national in its character, and must be governed by a uniform system, so long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate it, or allowing the States so to do, it thereby indicates its will that such commerce shall be free and untrammeled. * * * The conclusion follows that as the grant of the power to regulate commerce among the States, so far as one system is required, is exclusive, the States can not exercise the power without the assent of Congress."

In reviewing the cases of County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691), Escanaba Co. v. Chicago (107 U. S., 678), Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S., 623), and other cases, including Eilenbecker v. District Court of Plymouth County (134 U. S., 31, 40), mentioned in Leisy v. Hardin, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said:

"These decisions rest upon the undoubted right of the States of the Union to control their purely internal affairs, in doing which they exercise powers not surrendered to the National Government; but whenever the law of the State amounts essentially to a regulation of commerce with foreign nations or among the States, as it does when it inhibits, directly or indirectly, the receipt of an imported commodity or its disposition before it has ceased to become an article of trade between one State and another, or another country and this, it comes in conflict with a power which, in this particular, has been exclusively vested in the General Government, and is therefore void."

And again, in the same opinion, the Chief Justice says:

"Undoubtedly it is for the legislative branch of the State governments to determine whether the manufacture of particular articles of traffic, or the sale of such articles, will injuriously affect the public, and it is not for Congress to determine what measures a State may properly adopt as appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety; but notwithstanding it is not vested with supervisory power over matters of local administration, the responsibility is upon Congress, so far as the regulation of interstate commerce is concerned, to remove the restriction upon the State in dealing with imported articles of trade within its limits, which have not been mingled with the common mass of property therein, if in its judgment the end to be secured justifies and requires such action."

And in the same opinion it is further said:

"The plaintiffs in error are citizens of Illinois, are not pharmacists, and have no permit, but import into Iowa beer, which they sell in original packages, as described. Under our decision in Bowman v. Chicago Railway Co. (supra), they had the right to import this beer into that State, and in the view which we have expressed they had the right to sell it, by which act alone it would become mingled in the common mass of property within the State. Up to that point of time we hold that in the absence of congressional permission to do so the State had no power to interfere by seizure or any other action in prohibition of importation and sale by the foreign or nonresident importer. Whatever our individual views may be as to the deleterious or dangerous qualities of particular articles, we can not hold that any articles which Congress recognizes as subjects of interstate commerce are not such or that whatever are thus recognized can be controlled by State laws amounting to regulations while they retain that character, although at the same time, if directly dangerous in themselves, the State may take appropriate measures to guard against injury before it obtains complete jurisdiction over them.

"To concede to a State the power to exclude, directly or indirectly, articles so situated, without congressional permission, is to concede to a majority of the people of a State, represented in the State legislature, the power to regulate commercial intercourse between the States, by determining what shall be its subjects, when that power was distinctly granted to be exercised by the people of the United States, represented in Congress, and its possession by the latter was considered essential to that more perfect Union which the Constitution was adopted to create. Undoubtedly there is a difficulty in drawing the line between the municipal powers of the one government and the commercial powers of the other, but when that line is determined, in the particular instance, accommodation to it, without serious inconvenience, may readily be found, to use the language of Mr. Justice Johnson, in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., i, 238), in 'a frank and candid cooperation for the general good.'"

And in the Rahrer case it is said that—

"No reason is perceived why, if Congress chooses to provide that certain designated subjects of interstate commerce shall be governed by a rule which divests them of that character at an earlier period of time than would otherwise be the case, it is not within its competency to do so.

* * * * * * *

"The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of a subject matter specifically committed to its charge. The manner of that disposition brought into determination upon this record involves no ground for adjudging the act of Congress inoperative and void."

Now, this bill is a presentation, as we have endeavored to show, of the conclusion derived from a just construction of constitutional law and a study of adjudged cases that an act passed in pursuance of the power of Congress to regulate commerce can authorize the operation of the internal laws of the State sooner than these laws could have operated without this legislation. That is the case here.

As we have shown, in the Rahrer case it was held that the sale in Kansas of intoxicating liquors transported from the State of Missouri could be prevented by the State, although such liquors were in the original package. It was held in that case that the act of Congress allowed the police regulations of the State governing intoxicating liquors to become operative sooner than would have been the case had Congress remained silent on the subject.

The proposition here is that it is entirely competent for Congress to go a step further and allow such State regulation to become operative upon the arrival of such liquors within the boundaries of the State, before and after delivery, provided that such regulation shall not interfere with liquors being transported through the State to points beyond its limits, and shall not interfere with the right of the citizen to have transported into the State from another State liquors for his own use. It is upon this theory that this bill is predicated, and with the belief that the courts will uphold its constitutionality.

The development of congressional and judicial thought on the line that the State has, within its boundaries, the right to regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors, whether produced within or brought from without its boundaries, culminating in the act of August 8, 1890, and the decisions referred to, is the foundation for the belief that this bill will stand the test of judicial scrutiny. Whether the Wilson law is in effect a legislative declaration that the decisions in New York v. Miln and in Pierce v. New Hampshire, and other like cases, correctly interpreted the power of Congress and the power of the State, or whether it is congressional assent to the operation of State laws upon articles of commerce when once brought into the State sooner than would have been the case in the absence of congressional action, we need not stop to discuss. The constitutionality of the law, we believe, has been, at all events, established. This view is enough to meet the requirements of local self-government in the States, and still it does not, we think, militate against the idea that the control of interstate commerce is an exclusive and plenary power of Congress.

* * * * * * *

The purpose of this proposed law, and its sole purpose, is to allow each State to carry out its own domestic or internal policy in regard to the control of intoxicating beverages within the boundaries of the State.

The sole effect will be to permit the State, if it so wills, to circumscribe the sale of intoxicating beverages within its boundaries to the full extent that it may desire to restrain such traffic or to regulate the sale of the same through the medium of its own laws, including local-option laws, high-license laws, or dispensary laws. * * *

Mr. Speaker, in view of the assaults made upon the constitutionality of the pending bill, I think it but fair to have printed the argument made by Mr. Fred S. Caldwell, of Oklahoma City, Okla., who made the first draft of this bill. His argument was before the Committee on the Judiciary, and is as follows:

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have here a list of citations to authorities, to which I will refer in the course of my argument. Some of them, perhaps, in the limited time I will make no reference to. But, if there is no objection, I will hand this list to the reporter and ask that it be incorporated into the record at this time in order that the committee may have before them references to those cases, if they should desire to refer to them afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection, and the list will be incorporated in the remarks at this point.

"The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 3.)

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 18.)

Mr. CALDWELL. My argument will be, in a measure, in answer to the learned gentleman who discussed this matter before you this morning, and will be directed in support of House bills 17593 and 16214. So far as the interests for which I speak are concerned, either bill will, in our opinion, give the relief, and as Mr. Webb has stated to the committee, they are practically the same, as the committee undoubtedly have advised themselves.

The question was raised this morning that Congress can not pass either of these bills, because to do so would mean to delegate certain power to the several States, which power, by the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, has been vested exclusively in Congress. In order that we may get at the question that is before us perhaps it will be well to really put the matter specifically before the committee. I will undertake to do that briefly by making specific reference to the laws of the State of Oklahoma, with which I happen to be somewhat familiar.

Oklahoma, as certain members of this committee undoubtedly know, was born into the Union a prohibition State, and perhaps not altogether voluntarily. At least one-half of the State, in area, was that portion of the present State which was occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes, and Congress—or the United States, rather—was bound by Indian treaties to keep liquor out of that country and away from the Indians. I suppose, pursuant to the obligation of those Indian treaties, the condition was written into the enabling act that Oklahoma must, by ordinance irrevocable, write into its constitution, its fundamental law, prohibition for the Indian Territory side for 21 years. We did that. At the same time we submitted a separate amendment to the people which would provide for Statewide prohibition. It was adopted by a majority of something more than 18,000. Last fall, under a proposed amendment to the constitution, a resubmission, as we call it, of that issue—Statewide prohibition—was reaffirmed by something more than 20,000 majority.

The situation in Oklahoma is this: The first legislature gave life to the constitutional provision which, in itself, according to the decisions of our courts, was self-executing, by passing what we called, or what our supreme court, for the sake of brevity, has called, the enforcement act. Among other things that act provides that it shall be a crime to sell, barter, give away, etc., or otherwise furnish certain liquors, or to have the possession of any such liquor with the intent to violate any of the provisions of that act. One of the provisions of the act is that liquor can not be sold, so that if A B has a case of whisky in his possession with the intent to sell any of it A B is a criminal. The liquor is a nuisance; it can be seized, tried, condemned, and destroyed.

At this point I want to refer to a statement made by that eminent jurist, Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, something like 50 years ago, when he was construing an act of that State with reference to intoxicating liquors which made a similar provision—that is, it provided for search and seizure process and trial of the liquor, and the liquor's condemnation provided the unlawful intent was found to exist. I have cited the case in the list which I have given the reporter. It is Commonwealth against Intoxicating Liquors (107 Mass., 399). It is said in that case:

"The seizure of liquors under the statute of 1869, chapter 415, because they are kept for sale illegally, is a proceeding in rem"—an action against the offending thing—"which regards such liquors as a nuisance. The statute permits the keeper or any other person to come and claim them as his property, and if they appear to be his they are delivered to him, unless they are so kept as to constitute what the statute regards as a nuisance."

In another Massachusetts case, Fisher against McGirr (1 Gray (Mass.), 1), the courts say:

"To see whether any trial is provided for, we must first ask what is to be tried."

I will state to the committee that in the case of Fisher against McGirr the question of due process of law was before the court, and in that case they held that particular law unconstitutional and void, in that it did not provide for a trial which would satisfy the due process of law provision of the Constitution.

"The case supposes that the keeping of spirituous liquors intended for sale is made unlawful by the statute; that the illegality consists in the intent of selling; that the intent qualifies the act of keeping and impresses on the property illegally kept the character of a nuisance."

The case of whisky, in Oklahoma, kept with intent to violate any of the liquor laws of Oklahoma, is by that intent impressed with the character of a nuisance. We proceed against it by an action in rem, just as the learned justice says. How do we do that? By the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States it is provided that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law. Our constitution provides that anyone whose property is to be tried and condemned has a right to a hearing. I would like to state also that a search and seizure warrant can not issue except upon probable cause having been shown by affidavit or affirmation before some judicial officer. The liquor, we will say, is in Oklahoma, and we will eliminate the question of interstate commerce. There is no question of interstate commerce in this case. There is the case of liquor. No officer in the State of Oklahoma can summarily go and seize that liquor, or destroy it, or do anything with it, unless he actually sees the person selling it. In other words, our law—and I think it is not unusual—provides this, that an officer may, without process, arrest a man if he takes him in commission of the criminal act.

The CHAIRMAN. He catches him in flagrante delicto?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir. But he must immediately take him before a proper tribunal and there swear to the complaint against him, and then the writ is issued which holds him for trial. The liquor is perfectly safe until the machinery of the law is set in motion against it, and that is done in this way: A, B, or C, or whoever has knowledge of the fact which supports the belief that the liquor is there, kept with the intent to violate the law, goes before some judicial tribunal of Oklahoma. He may go before a justice of the peace; he may go before a county judge, and the county courts of Oklahoma are courts of record; he may go before the superior court, and the superior courts of Oklahoma are courts of record; or he may go before the judge of the district court, and they are courts of record, any one of those judicial tribunals; and he makes affidavit to the facts, and the judicial officer passes upon those facts, supported by oath or affirmation, and he determines the existence or nonexistence of probable cause for believing that the nuisance exists. If, in his opinion, in the exercise of his judicial power, probable cause exists, he so finds, and he issues his warrant, directed to the constable or the sheriff, the executive officer of the court. That warrant is issued in the name of the State of Oklahoma, commanding that officer to go to the place, search, and, if he finds, seize the liquor; and do what? Arrest it, simply arrest it, and bring it into court. The law provides that the officer must make a return to that writ within three days of the time it is issued, and the return must show what the officer did. Suppose he found a case of whisky. He makes his return, which says, "I received this writ on such a day, and I executed it by going to the place and searching, and there finding and seizing a case of whisky," which he turns over to the court. Upon that return the court must set a hearing, not less than 10 days nor more than 30 days, so that they can not take snap judgment, neither can they keep the man's property if he had it for personal use, which is not barred by our law, tied up indefinitely. That hearing must be held in not less than 10 days nor more than 30 days later. What is tried? The status of that case of whisky. They may have a trial to a jury. You will find all this matter settled and the constitutionality of the law sustained by an opinion of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma in State, ex rel., v. Hooker (Okla.; 98 Pac., 964), which is among the citations I have given. If the fact be found that the liquor was kept or possessed by any person with the intent to violate the law, then judgment is pronounced, and the judgment is forfeiture, and the liquors are destroyed.

But an appeal can be had, and even to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma; and if, in the proceeding, any Federal question be introduced—if it should be claimed that the party had rights under the Constitution of the United States or any act of Congress—a writ of error could be prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States, even though it were only a case of liquor. It is regular, it is orderly, it is a judicial proceeding according to the due process of law provision.

That answers us abundantly and perfectly well in so far as liquors are concerned which are not in the channels of interstate commerce. But suppose there is a case of liquor, a barrel of liquor—yes, 10 barrels of liquor, each one, say, weighing five or six hundred pounds—I am not up on those matters as I was two or three years ago, but I remember that it was not uncommon to find shipments, before the penal code provisions went into effect, of a box of liquor of 450 pounds, which meant that a barrel of liquor was incased in a box and shipped into Oklahoma. We will say there are 10 barrels of whisky at the Santa Fe depot in Oklahoma City, and they have been purchased in Kansas City by John Doe, who is a well-known joint keeper in Oklahoma City. He has paid the special tax required by the United States of liquor dealers, which, under the laws of Oklahoma, is prima facie evidence of his intent to violate the liquor laws of Oklahoma. Why should any man in Oklahoma pay $25 to the United States Government unless he intends to violate the liquor laws or sell liquor? That nuisance—at least, that thing—is there; it is in Oklahoma. He intends to violate the law with it. But what happens? Oklahoma can not touch it. He can say openly, "Yes; I intend to sell it. I intend to violate the laws of Oklahoma; but you can not touch it. It has not been delivered to me under the contract of interstate shipment at the point of destination." Well, suppose we are exasperated to the extent of seizing it anyhow. It comes into court in the same process I have outlined, and he comes into court and says, "It makes no difference about my intent. I concede that; I admit that. But the liquor was not delivered."

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you, if it will not disturb your argument, you say the man avows that he is going to sell that liquor in violation of the laws of Oklahoma. He receives the barrel of whisky from the railroad company after having made that statement. Then could not the State authority seize the liquor after it is in his possession?

Mr. CALDWELL. That is not an open question. It would not be necessary, Mr. Chairman, for anyone to come before this committee to contend for a proposition so thoroughly and so completely settled as that. But just as clearly and conclusively is it settled that until that delivery is made we can not seize it.

Mr. MOON. Let me ask you a question upon that point. I do not understand that to be the law at all. It is only while that liquor is in transit. When that liquor arrives at its destination it is either to be delivered or it is held by the railroad company in a warehouse, and being held in a warehouse, according to my conception of the law, would subject it to the operation of the laws of Oklahoma; it is not in transit.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then the gentleman differs with the Supreme Court of the United States and with the Supreme Court of Oklahoma. The Supreme Court of the United States did say this, in the case of Heyman v. Southern Railway Co. (203 U. S., 217)—they leave it an open question as to how long the carrier could keep it in the warehouse for delivery. They did not say that 5 days would be an unreasonable time or that 30 days would be an unreasonable time.

Mr. MOON. But they did draw a distinction between liquor in transit and that in a warehouse?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir; they also said that the rule would not apply which, as between individuals, the consignee and the carrier, would make the carrier a warehouseman and not a carrier. You understand that as to interstate commerce—if a commodity is shipped to me from Kansas City to Oklahoma City the carrier has it there for delivery and notifies me, and I am given a reasonable time to come there and receive it. Then the carrier's liability as a carrier, which is greater than the carrier's liability as warehouseman, ceases, and after that time they are warehousemen and not carriers. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the Heyman case, said that rule is not the test with reference to liquor.

Mr. MOON. But they did say, however, that it was not within the protection of interstate commerce if it was held by the carrier as a warehouseman and not as a carrier.

Mr. CALDWELL. It would be held by the carrier as warehouseman as between the carrier and the shipper; but it would not be held as warehouseman as between the State and the shipper.

Mr. MOON. If there is any imperfection in the laws of Oklahoma or in the construction by its courts, that is another question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Now, if the chairman will permit me, I will proceed. This is departing somewhat from the first proposition, but digressions seem to be in order. Suppose some one, A, B, or C, or all three of them, go before the county court, a court of record, and make affidavit to the fact that at the Santa Fe Depot in Oklahoma City are certain liquors, describing them; that they are kept and intended to be used in violation of the laws of Oklahoma; and the county judge, from an examination of those facts, finds that probable cause exists, and he issues the warrant, and the officer proceeds to the station, arrests the liquor, and brings it into court. A trial is had, and what happens? The claimant comes in. If he is a local bootlegger who is well known, he will not come directly; he will have the shipper, the Kansas City wholesale house, come in. But they come in and make this claim: "Those 10 barrels of whisky were purchased in Kansas City; they were delivered to the Santa Fe Railroad Co. for transportation to Oklahoma City; and they had not been delivered under the contract of interstate shipment at the time this seizure was made. Therefore they were interstate commerce, it makes no difference what the man intended to do with them, and we demand a return." There is only one thing for the court to do, and that is to return them.

Mr. CARLIN. Who is hurt by that transaction?

Mr. CALDWELL. The State of Oklahoma; and I will tell you why. Suppose they are returned; and then, when the officers are not standing on picket, under the cover of darkness or otherwise—and many deliveries are made clandestinely, let me tell you—anyhow, the delivery is made. Here is the carrier, the Santa Fe Railroad Co. [indicating], here is the liquor, and here is the consignee, and the delivery is made. What happens? Instantly the consignee who receives the possession of the liquor becomes a criminal, because he has 10 barrels of whisky in his possession with intent to violate the law. Instantly the liquors are not property, but a public nuisance, and every time the Santa Fe Railroad makes a delivery of that sort in the State of Oklahoma it creates a public nuisance in the State of Oklahoma, and the consignee is a criminal.

Mr. CARLIN. But I am speaking of the case where the liquor was returned, sent back.

Mr. CALDWELL. They do not send it back; they simply return it to the Santa Fe Railroad Co. and put it there in the station. They do not have to return it. It is interstate commerce, and under the present commerce laws they have a right to ship it in there.

The CHAIRMAN. You restore the status as it was before the seizure was made.

Mr. CARLIN. They restore it to the carrier?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; and then the carrier can make the delivery under the interstate contract of shipment.

Mr. CARLIN. I understood you to say they returned it to the consignor.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I say he can make claim, but they deliver it back to the carrier, who then holds it under the contract of interstate shipment until he can make the delivery under the contract of interstate shipment. Let me show you about the carrier shipping it back. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. The F. W. Cook Brewing Co., hold that the liquor dealer can make the carrier take it in there.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a late case?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; that is a late case, No. 64, October term, 1911. There are some interesting statements in that case by Justice Lurton. Mind you, the Kentucky law prohibits the transportation of liquor from a wet county into a dry county; that is intrastate. The violator of the law in the dry county, then, can not buy liquor in a wet county of Kentucky and take it into a dry county. So he goes over into Ohio, or Tennessee, or Missouri, and the railroad company—or at least this railroad company did, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co.—says, "We will not carry that into the dry county." He says, "I will see whether you do or not." So he went into court to mandamus the carrier to take the liquor from the wet State for delivery into the dry county, when the carrier could not take liquor from the wet county into a dry county; and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained that and said the carrier has to take it, and not only that, but they say the law of Kentucky is commendable which prohibits the carrying of the liquor from the wet county into the dry county. They do not say how commendable is the law of the United States which makes the railroad company carry it from a wet State into that dry county. I read the language of the court:

"Valid as the Kentucky legislation undoubtedly was as a regulation in respect to intrastate shipments of such articles, it was most obviously never an effective enactment in so far as it undertook to regulate interstate shipments to dry points. Pending this very litigation, the Kentucky Court of Appeals, upon the authority of the line of cases above cited, reached the same conclusion.

"The obligation of the railroad company to conform to the requirements of the Kentucky law, so far as that law prohibited intrastate shipments, is clear, and to this extent its circular notification was commendable. But the duty of this company, as an interstate common carrier for hire, to receive for transportation to consignees upon its line in Kentucky from consignors in other States any commodity which is an ordinary subject of interstate commerce, and such transportation could not be prohibited by any law of the State of such consignee, inasmuch as any law would be an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce not authorized by the police power of the State. It is obvious, therefore, that in so far as the Kentucky statute was an illegal regulation of interstate commerce, it neither imposed an obligation to obey nor affords an excuse for refusal to perform the general duty of the railroad company as a common carrier of freight."

The CHAIRMAN. That opinion was merely a restatement of principles heretofore decided by the court in other cases, do you not think?

Mr. CALDWELL. Undoubtedly so; but it emphasizes the unfortunate situation with reference to interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors.

Mr. CARLIN. The court uses the word "duty" of the railroad company. Do you think the duty referred to there is the constitutional duty?

Mr. CALDWELL. As long as the thing is interstate commerce, then it is a constitutional duty in this sense, that the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States requires that it be done.

The CHAIRMAN. If it would not interrupt you, right at this point I want to reply to the suggestion that was made a while ago in a colloquy with Judge MOON, and cite from this decision from which you read:

"The Wilson Act, which subjects such liquors to State regulation, although still in the original packages, does not apply before actual delivery to such consignee where the shipment is interstate. Some of the many later cases in which these matters have been so determined and the Wilson Act construed are: Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412); Vance v. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438); Heyman v. Southern Railway (203 U. S., 270); Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky (214 U. S., 218)."

Mr. CALDWELL Yes; all those cases, and many others cited.

Mr. MOON. It has also been said by the Supreme Court that it is a delivery to the consignee, and the railroad company holds it as warehouseman, as the agent of that consignee, after a certain time.

Mr. CALDWELL. But that certain time is a very indefinite thing. The railroad companies in Oklahoma—in prohibition States it is a constant conflict between the traffic department and the operating department over intoxicating liquors. The operating department, which really includes the legal department, are worried to death by claims with reference to these shipments, and the difficulties they get into; but immediately upon the carrier imposing a restriction or a limitation which will relieve them against that, the brewers and the big distillers go to the traffic department and they say, "Here, you are shipping lots of stuff into the wet States," and they suggest that they will divert the traffic if they do not extend to them the privileges that they are demanding. The carriers, so far as they can all agree, can make a regulation. They had a 15-day limitation at one time, and at one time a 5-day limitation, that if the shipment was not delivered within 5 days they would return it. But suppose they did return it? Then they got into a controversy with the shipper for the freight on the return shipment. It simply forces the carrier to act as the supply agent for the bootlegger and the joint keeper, and you can not get away from it. That is just, in simple terms, exactly what it does.

Coming, now, to the gentleman's argument, he says that Congress can not so regulate commerce as to avoid that thing. It is an unfortunate situation if that can not be done. If the Federal courts, on the one hand, must, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, compel the carrier to perform that duty to the bootlegger and the joint keeper and the speak-easy and the blind tiger in the dry territory of the country, it is an unfortunate thing.

Mr. MOON. I might say that I did not understand Mr. Maxwell to state that. He said we could not do it in this way. I do not think he assumed or stated that Congress could not regulate it.

Mr. CALDWELL. You will agree that he did not suggest any means by which it could be done, and I take it——

Mr. MOON. No; he was here speaking to this bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. I take it he would oppose any bill.

Mr. MAXWELL. Why do you not shut up your speak-easy?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will tell you exactly why. We could picket that particular station where those 10 casks of whisky are for a while and after they ran out of a supply it would be shut up; the sign would be up, "Boys, nothing doing." But if we do not happen to have police officers enough to patrol every inch of railroad in the State of Oklahoma, at some point or some place that thing would be slipped out, and then they would be away with it, like a rat in a hole, and you have to dig for it; as Mr. Baker, I think, suggested an experience they had in Ohio about going after it. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure; there is no question about that. If Congress will so regulate interstate commerce that the liquor in the hands of the carrier, which is intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State, is not interstate commerce, then we will stop it, because we will take those 10 casks of whisky and throw them in the ditch. It will be easy; it will be simple. I think that the learned gentleman and his clients fully appreciate how easily it could then be done.

Mr. MOON. Suppose we meet that situation by saying that if the common carrier holds liquor shipped to a consignee more than 15 days it shall amount to a constructive delivery?

Mr. CALDWELL. It would not meet it at all, because that is the law now.

Mr. MOON. I understood you to say it was not.

Mr. CALDWELL. No, sir. The only way you can meet it is to take intoxicating liquor intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State out of interstate commerce. And why should it not be taken out? Why should it be interstate commerce? Let us differentiate a minute. I think you will all agree that a thing is not necessarily interstate commerce just because it is in the channels of interstate commerce.

Mr. CARLIN. Do you mean to say that Congress ought to declare that intoxicating liquor should not be the subject of interstate commerce?

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not say that, Mr. Carlin. I said that Congress should say that liquor intended to be used in violation of the laws of a State should not be interstate commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Practically, then, how can you determine that fact until that liquor is shipped?

Mr. CALDWELL. Why is it necessary to determine it before it is shipped? It never gets into the channels of interstate commerce until it is shipped.

The CHAIRMAN. At the initial point, then.

Mr. CALDWELL. We do not care what they do at the initial point outside of the State of Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. Under this law the common carrier, it seems to me, ought to know whether he is engaged in a matter in violation of law or not.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. It will concern him very much to know whether he is going on in violation of law or not.

Mr. CALDWELL. And that is why these bills are so drafted as not to make it a violation on the part of the carrier. It ought not to be.

Mr. DAVIS. But you deprive him of all compensation for the shipment.

Mr. CALDWELL. No. He can demand his compensation in advance.

Mr. DAVIS. If he does it as to the liquor shipment, must he do it as to all shipments?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; and I will tell you why. At the present time—I do not know about the railroad companies in this part of the Union—I know in Oklahoma and kindred States you can not ship household goods without paying the freight in advance. The poor emigrant who goes from Missouri into Oklahoma, or, if he should happen to be starving out in the western part of Oklahoma or in the Panhandle of Texas, and wants to go to his relatives in Missouri, can not move his household goods until he pays the freight in advance.

Mr. NORRIS. Do they not apply that rule to Congressmen, too? I have had to do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; I suppose so. We in Oklahoma see no reason why Mr. Pabst and Mr. Schlitz and the great brewing interests and the liquor interests should not be required to pay in advance freight on their shipments, if the poor householder is required to pay in advance freight on his household goods. Furthermore, they simply do it for their own protection. Gentlemen, I am not willing to concede that it is even required. I remember not many years ago I had a client in Oklahoma City who represented a local wholesale seed house, one of the largest seed houses of the West. He was a Dane, a rather obstreperous sort of fellow. He was always in controversy with the local freight agents about his shipments. If any thing came in a little short, he was going to have that shortage, and the controversy between him and the representative of the Rock Island Railroad Co. developed to the point where they would not deliver one of his cars and would not set a car in for him unless he paid the freight on it in advance. I looked the matter up somewhat for him, and I may be wrong, but I reached this conclusion, that the railroad company could not be compelled to extend credit to anybody if they did not want to. That is, they had a right to determine for themselves whether or not the shipper was entitled to credit. If he was a pauper, or if for any reason, in the exercise of their judgment in the carrying on of their business, they thought he was unworthy of credit, I knew of no law, and found none, that compelled them to extend him credit. So I say, in answer to Mr. Davis's question, I know of no law which would be violated by the railroad company if they should say that the freight on liquor shipped into dry territory must be paid in advance.

Mr. WEBB. Telegraph companies require senders of telegrams to pay in advance, when they do not know the senders.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEBB. They do not require me to pay in advance.

Mr. CALDWELL. But if you were to go to San Francisco, where you were not very well known, and wanted to send a telegram home, you would have to pay for it in advance.

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. I think his face would entitle him to send it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. You could not say that of all the liquor dealers. [Renewed laughter.]

Is it a delegation of power? I have written out here that famous commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. And I say that not in any disparaging sense, because I believe that, so far as the country as a whole is concerned and the development of the Nation that was then building is concerned, there is not another part of the Constitution of the United States into which so much is injected in the same space.

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

It is no longer an open question as to what Congress can do with reference to commerce with the Indian tribes, especially in intoxicating liquors. They can absolutely prohibit it, and have done it. It is a fixed policy. It is no longer an open question as to what Congress can do under that language of the Constitution with reference to foreign commerce. They can prohibit it absolutely. The Supreme Court at this term reaffirmed that in the case of the vessel Abby Dodge, No. 41 at the present term, and they cite an old case. They say it is settled law. So far as the language of that provision goes, they can do all to commerce among the States that they can do to foreign commerce or commerce with the Indian tribes. So, if there are limitations, they must be found in some other provision of the Constitution.

Furthermore, in this same section, at the end of it, is this:

"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers"—

among which is the power to regulate interstate commerce. This is a dual form of government. They must work together, articulate together, but each in its separate sphere is supreme—the States in theirs, the Federal Government in its. The States exercise the police powers to regulate intrastate commerce; Congress regulates interstate commerce, and has all the power that is necessary to regulate interstate commerce expressly conferred by the Constitution, not implied, but expressly conferred.

We may, I think, agree on this: That if Congress can so regulate interstate commerce as to avoid a conflict between the exercise of the police powers of the State and interstate commerce, it ought to be done. This has not been done in the past; those conflicts have occurred until this is the settled law. It was not so in the beginning; it was a great question. The Supreme Court of the United States decided one way, and they decided another, and for years the line of cleavage was not well marked. But finally this has been settled as the law: That where the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and the power of the State over its internal affairs, the police powers of the State, conflict, the power of Congress to regulate commerce is supreme.

It is impossible to have two irresistible bodies, I believe, moving in opposite directions against each other at the same time. One has to be supreme, and the power of Congress is supreme. This power of Congress, then, to regulate interstate commerce is not a weakling if it is so strong and so powerful that it stands above the police powers of the State.

In Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S., 661) the Supreme Court of the United States said that it was within the police power of a State to prohibit the manufacture of liquor for the personal use of the manufacturer. Likewise, even though he intended to sell the product through the channels of interstate commerce beyond the State. So the police power is pretty well defined. I think at the last term of court the Supreme Court of the United States decided the case of Noble State Bank v. Haskell, a case that went up from Oklahoma involving the constitutionality of the bank-guaranty law. Mr. Justice Holmes, in the discussion there, very tersely says that with regard to the police power of a State the lines are pricked out by the decisions first on the one side and then on the other, but, suffice it to say, that the bank-guaranty law is well within the police power of the State. There is the banking business, and under that decision a man can not engage in the banking business in Oklahoma on the theory that it is a vested right and that he has a right to carry on that business. He must comply with the State laws and guarantee his depositors.

Mr. CARLIN. What would you do with this language used by Mr. Justice Shiras in the case of Vance v. Vandercook Co.:

"The conceded purpose of protecting commerce from hostile action between the States would be defeated if Congress withdraw from the exercise of its power in such matters and turn them over to the legislatures of the States."

Mr. CALDWELL. From what case did you read that?

Mr. CARLIN. From Vance v. Vandercook.

Mr. CALDWELL. By Mr. Justice Shiras?

Mr. CARLIN. He was delivering the dissenting opinion there.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; I wanted to bring that point out; that is from the dissenting opinion.

Mr. CARLIN. The opinion of the court sustained the same idea; but he was giving his reasons for that.

Mr. CALDWELL. According to Mr. Justice Shiras, the opinion of the court did not sustain just that idea. He dissented on that ground. But I will answer the question, which is very pertinent. My answer to it is this: That if Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate interstate commerce, takes a thing out of interstate commerce, then it is absolutely immaterial what the State does with it, because it is not interstate commerce. That is exactly what this bill will do with reference to intoxicating liquor that is intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is to be introduced. It is taken out of interstate commerce; it is not interstate commerce any more than rags infected with yellow fever or diseased meat.

Mr. DAVIS. What is it that determines whether or not it shall be taken out of interstate commerce?

Mr. CALDWELL. That intent. For instance, as Chief Justice Shaw said in a Massachusetts case, the thing that determines whether or not the liquor is a nuisance or is property is the intent of the possessor. He says that intent impresses upon it the character of a nuisance. If it does, what is the effect? You divest it of all property rights and you destroy it. Here is a case of liquor and A B possesses it. He intends it for his own personal use; that does not violate the law. It is then property. Nobody can interfere with it; it is his property. But he changes his mind. He intends to use it in violation of law, to sell it; it is no longer property. His intent—and I take Chief Justice Shaw for it, and it is well settled by a long line of decisions—impresses upon that case of liquor the character of a nuisance, and it is not property.

Mr. MOON. By virtue of a State law?

Mr. CALDWELL. By virtue of a State law.

Mr. CARLIN. Right there let me call your attention to this, and ask ask your view of it.

Mr. CALDWELL. One at a time, gentlemen.

Mr. CARLIN. It involves the same thing; it will enable you to answer that question—that is, if you can in view of this language, quoting from a majority opinion in that case.

Mr. CALDWELL. Vance v. Vandercook?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes. Justice White made this statement:

"Conceding, without deciding, the power of the State where it has placed the control of the sale of all liquor within the State in charge of its own officers to provide for an inspection of liquors shipped into a State by residents of other States for use by residents within the State, it is clear that such a law, to be valid, must not substantially hamper or burden the constitutional right on the one hand to make and on the other hand to receive such shipment."

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir. Do you want to get my interpretation of that language?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes. What effect does this have when you apply that language to it?

Mr. CALDWELL. It has exactly the same effect that the Wilson Act had on the liquor which was intended to be sold in the original package.

Mr. CARLIN. I am speaking of the constitutional right of the individual.

Mr. CALDWELL. The right to resell in the original package was, before the passage of the Wilson Act, a constitutional right.

Mr. CARLIN. And the right of Congress, even if it intended to delegate that constitutional right to the State.

Mr. CALDWELL. You have a double question now. The last question is not pertinent to the main question. Before the Wilson Act was passed you must remember that in that same sense there was the constitutional right to resell in the original package.

I shall not be impatient with the members of the committee if they do not at first all agree with me in this proposition, because I confess that to a legal mind it seems to me that you are using improper language when you speak of a constitutional right and then say that Congress can take away that constitutional right. But the term is not well chosen in that sense. It was a constitutional right in that they said it was conferred by the commerce clause of the Constitution, but not absolutely fixed until Congress had spoken.

Mr. CARLIN. Justice Shiras takes the other view of that.

Mr. CALDWELL. The majority of the court did not agree with Justice Shiras.

Mr. CARLIN. I am showing you the two are not very far apart, so far as the language is concerned.

Mr. CALDWELL. I had not finished, Mr. Carlin. The Supreme Court held in the Rahrer case that that right to resell in the original package, which had been sustained in Leisy v. Hardin, as a part of the interstate commerce, could, by an act of Congress passed in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce, be taken away. I contend in the same way Congress might so regulate commerce as to take away this right for personal use. But, speaking for Oklahoma, I say to you that we are not asking that, because down there we are prohibitionists of this sort—we are prohibitionists because we are opposed to the traffic and the institution of the saloon. We do not berate the man just because he uses, in a decent way, intoxicating liquor, although, speaking for myself, I am a total abstainer. But we believe that if the use of intoxicating liquor had at all times been confined to the home—personal use in the home—there never would have been the question of prohibition.

So that primarily we prohibit the sale of those things in order to strike down that traffic—the open saloon and its attendant and kindred evils. If the time should ever come when, in order to protect the morals and the public welfare of the State of Oklahoma, it should, in the opinion of the legislative power of the State, become necessary to prohibit the personal use of intoxicating liquor, who ought to have the right to exercise that power, the Congress of the United States or the State of Oklahoma? We say that Congress has nothing to do with that question, and that it is none of Congress's business whether the people in the State of Oklahoma shall drink liquor, have it in their homes for their personal use, or whether they shall sell it.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood you to contend yesterday, Mr. Caldwell, in the informal colloquy we had about it, that the State did not have the power to forbid the use to its citizens, because the right to use was a necessary incident of the right to ship and purchase interstate.

Mr. CALDWELL. I added this to that: I said until Congress should further regulate as to interstate commerce, go further than Congress did go in the Wilson Act, and I think the record will bear me out in that.

I will read you a statement of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma in a case which I have cited here—the Schwedes case—on this personal-use proposition, and then refer specifically to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, principally Vance v. Vandercook, as authority:

"Under subdivision 3, paragraph 8, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, commonly referred to as the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, a resident of one State has the right to have shipped to him from another State alcoholic liquors when ordered by him for his and his family's use, and to keep the same for such use; and the State can not, under its police power, enact laws so as to substantially hamper or burden such constitutional right to have such shipment made and to receive and retain the same for personal use."

Vance v. Vandercook is quoted there as read by Mr. Carlin, and I want to call your attention at this time to a statement in Pabst Brewing Co. v. Crenshaw, to the same effect. This is not my interpretation of Vance v. Vandercook; it is not the interpretation of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma of Vance v. Vandercook, but it is the interpretation of the Supreme Court of the United States of Vance v. Vandercook, and it is given in the case of Pabst Brewing Co. v. Crenshaw. I read from the opinion this excerpt:

"In Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438; 42 L. ed., 1100; 18 Supt. Ct. Rep., 674) the operation of a liquor law of South Carolina was considered. By the act in question the State of South Carolina took exclusive charge of the sale of liquor within the State, appointed its agents to sell the same, and empowered them to purchase the liquor, which was to be brought into the State for sale. The fact was that by the act in question the State of South Carolina, instead of forbidding the traffic in liquor, authorized it and engaged in the liquor business for its own account, using it as a source of revenue. The act, in addition, affixed prerequisite conditions to the shipment into South Carolina from other States of liquor to a consumer who had purchased it for his own use and not for sale. Considering the Wilson Act and the previous decisions applying it, it was decided that the South Carolina law, in so far as it took charge in behalf of the State of the sale of liquor within the State, and made such sale a source of revenue, was not an interference with interstate commerce. In so far, however, as the State law imposed burdens on the right to ship liquor from another State to a resident of South Carolina intended for his own use, and not for sale within the State, the law was held to be repugnant to the Constitution, because the Wilson Act, whilst it delegated"—

Mr. MAXWELL, I am sure, will take exception to that; and I do, too. But as late as this—and that case is decided in 198 United States Reports—the Supreme Court used the term "delegated."

Mr. MOON. Delegate what?

Mr. CALDWELL. It says:

"Whilst it (the Wilson Act) delegated to the States plenary powers to regulate the sale of liquors in South Carolina."

The Wilson Act did not delegate the power. If it had delegated power it would have been unconstitutional.

Mr. MOON. "Relegate," he means, I guess.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; it is "delegate." I did not discover it just here.

Mr. CARLIN. If it had delegated the powers, it would have been unconstitutional.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. I only refer to it to show that the Supreme Court of the United States does not always speak technically correctly. In substance, I think their decisions, the construction of the Wilson Act in the Rahrer case, the Rhodes case, and all the others are good law.

Mr. MOON. Is that the original?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; it is not the original.

Mr. MOON. That is a republication?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I expect, if you examine the opinion, you will find the word "relegated."

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not go back and proof read it. But in working up that proposition, and in reviewing the hearings of four years ago, I ran across this statement, and I thought it was extraordinary that they used it that way.

Mr. MOON. Did you compare it?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I have not yet. It could not "relegate" to the States plenary powers very well. I think it would have to delegate to the States plenary power, if it did anything.

Mr. FLOYD. The State already had it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Exactly so. Here is the proposition, as I see it, with reference to the Wilson Act. Until the resale in the original package, or the original package was opened, the liquor was still in the field of interstate commerce, and the States could not touch it. What Congress did by the Wilson Act was simply to provide that the liquor should fall into other field of operation upon the delivery to the consignee, and before resale in the original package. It was not, accurately speaking, a letting down of the bars and letting the State into the field of interstate commerce. It was taking the liquor up and throwing it over the fence into that field which was not interstate commerce, and, of course, then the police power of the State attached to it.

Mr. DAVIS. Complete that quotation there.

Mr. CALDWELL. The quotation is this:

"In so far, however, as the State law imposed burdens on the right to ship liquor from another State to a resident of South Carolina intended for his own use, and not for sale within the State, the law was held to be repugnant to the Constitution, because the Wilson Act, whilst it delegated to the State plenary power to regulate the sale of liquors in South Carolina shipped into the State from other States, did not recognize the right of a State to prevent an individual from ordering liquors from outside of the State of his residence for his own consumption, and not for sale."

The Wilson Act did not take that right away. Not that Congress could not have taken it away by proper act, but the Wilson Act did not take it away.

The CHAIRMAN. The Wilson Act I have here before me, and it reads:

"That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein, for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory."

The Supreme Court seems to have practically nullified that by holding that the liquors had not arrived until delivered to the consignee, as I understand it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I agree with Mr. Maxwell that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Rhodes v. Iowa, decided as they did to sustain the constitutionality of the law. If you read the Rhodes case, I think you will find in it this language, that Congress did not intend to prohibit; not that they could not, but they did not intend to absolutely prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors, because they used this language, "That upon arrival within the State it shall become subject to the police powers of the State," and the court said if they had intended to prohibit intoxicating liquor absolutely from interstate commerce they would have said so.

Mr. MOON. The Supreme Court went further in its reasoning, and said Congress did not intend to do that because they had no constitutional power to do it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not agree with that.

Mr. CARLIN. Here is the case in which the idea that Congress had delegated its powers was sustained. I am reading from the Pabst Brewing Co. case. Justice White says:

"In so far, however, as the State law imposed burdens on the right to ship liquor from another State to a resident of South Carolina intended for his own use, and not for sale within the State, the law was held to be repugnant to the Constitution, because the Wilson Act, whilst it delegated to the State plenary power to regulate the sale of liquors in South Carolina shipped into the State from other States, did not recognize the right of a State to prevent an individual from ordering liquors from outside of the State of his residence for his own consumption, and not for sale."

Mr. CALDWELL. That is exactly as I have it here.

Mr. CARLIN. The delegation of power was held unconstitutional.

Mr. CALDWELL. I can not read it so. Read it again, Mr. CARLIN. It says, "repugnant to the Constitution"—I have compared mine with your reading, and mine is exactly like yours. It says "repugnant to the Constitution, because the Wilson Act, whilst it delegated to the State plenary power to regulate the sale of liquors in South Carolina shipped into the State from other States, did not recognize"—and, you might say, did not delegate—"the right of a State to prevent an individual from ordering liquors from outside of the State of his residence for his own consumption, and not for sale."

Mr. CARLIN. That is the very thing the court said Congress could not have done.

Mr. CALDWELL. I can not read it that way.

Mr. CARLIN. Is not that the very thing the court says Congress could not have done?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; it did not say that. They say that is what Congress did not do in the Wilson Act.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; but it says if it had done it, it would have been unconstitutional. That is what it says in plain terms:

"In so far, however, as the State law imposed burdens on the right to ship liquor from another State to a resident of South Carolina intended for his own use, and not for sale within the State, the law was held to be repugnant to the Constitution."

Mr. CALDWELL. It tells why it was. They do not say it was because Congress could not pass any such law. They do not say that.

Mr. CARLIN. Congress could not pass it if it is repugnant to the Constitution. That is a self-evident fact.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is true. And I pointed that out a moment ago.

Mr. CARLIN. It is fundamental that if it is repugnant to the Constitution, Congress has no control over it.

Mr. CALDWELL. And that is why it is not accurate to say, as the Supreme Court has said, that the Wilson Act took away somebody's constitutional right. It did not. The Constitution gives Congress power to regulate commerce; but Congress does not speak, and its silence means that commerce shall be free, the courts say. All right. Brown v. Maryland said that foreign commerce meant this: The purchase of the article in the foreign jurisdiction, its shipment, its receipt, and the breaking of the original package, or resale in the original package. Until Congress spoke that was interstate commerce.

Mr. MOON. Not under the Constitution.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; under the Constitution.

Mr. MOON. No; it did not say that. It said under the construction of Congress they had absolute control over interstate commerce; and as long as there was no legislation on the subject it was a naked declaration by Congress that the channels of interstate commerce should be free, and that the original act of commerce involved all those things. It does not say they were constitutional.

Mr. CALDWELL. Because the commerce clause of the Constitution conferred absolutely upon Congress the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. CARLIN. Do you think, then, Congress could prevent a shipment for personal use?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think they could; but I do not think Congress ought to do that or do anything about personal use, because I do not think it is any of their business to speak upon that. I think that the personal use, just as the right to sell, to maintain a saloon, or otherwise, is a matter that falls within the police power of the several States; and, as I said before, so far as the people of Oklahoma are concerned, they in their sovereign power should have the right to say whether or not liquor shall be used for personal use.

Mr. CARLIN. You say you think Congress could prevent these shipments for personal use?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; I think they could prohibit it absolutely.

Mr. CARLIN. But I am talking now about personal use, to prevent one citizen from sending into a State for the use of another citizen liquor of any sort or kind or quantity.

Mr. CALDWELL. That would depend on the regulation, the language of the act. If they would do this—if they would say that, where liquor is intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is to be introduced, interstate commerce in it is prohibited, then there will be no interstate commerce in that; and if you will pardon me at this time, I would like to read a quotation——

Mr. CARLIN. You do not agree, then, with Justice Shiras?

Mr. CALDWELL. The majority of the court did not.

Mr. CARLIN. The majority of the court did agree with him in reference to that. If you read the opinion here, you will see it says he dissented only in part. He states distinctly here that Congress has no power to prevent the shipment of liquors for personal use, and if it did so it would take away from the citizen a constitutional right.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; but that is contrary to the doctrine read us yesterday laid down In re Rahrer, because the Wilson Act did take away a right which, prior to the passing of the Wilson Act, the citizens of the States had under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CARLIN. Not for personal use.

Mr. CALDWELL. What is the difference?

Mr. CARLIN. That is the ground; that they could not take that into consideration.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not so consider it. I consider that decision differently; and Justice Shiras's opinion is the minority opinion and not the opinion of the court, and, in my mind, logically I can see no difference between Congress passing a law which takes away the right to resell in the original package—which, prior to this time, existed because of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States—and Congress passing a law which would take away the right to ship for personal use, which right now exists under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LITTLETON. Do you think if Congress undertook to do so they could prohibit the absolute sending of liquors through the channels of interstate commerce, regardless of any other question of policy?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir; I think so. I will answer that question before I take up the other proposition, because I do not want to overlook it. I think that for this reason, and I think Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court in the majority opinion in the Lottery case, gives the reason why. I confess that when studying this proposition I was first confronted by the suggestion, Can Congress, in its power to regulate commerce, prohibit the shipment of wheat from Minnesota into Kansas or to New York? I was not clear what those limitations were. But I believe the Supreme Court of the United States has settled that in the Lottery case, and I will read that portion of the decision which, to my mind, settles it. Before doing so, however, let me make this additional suggestion. The States, as to their internal affairs, have full, complete, and absolute power to regulate intrastate commerce. They have the police power, and they can so legislate as to absolutely prohibit commerce in intoxicating liquors. I do not believe they could so legislate as to prohibit commerce—I mean intrastate commerce—in foodstuffs, medicines, and things which do not fall within that indefinable sphere of the police power. But intoxicating liquors do come within that field of opertion, and they can absolutely prohibit them. Under the expression of the Supreme Court of the United States in Champion v. Ames I think we might, by way of analogy, say that it blazed the way and is the guide to Congress in its regulation of commerce when it comes to the question as to what they can prohibit absolutely and what they can prohibit upon condition, and what those conditions shall be. I find the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Lottery case, say exactly this:

"If a State, when considering legislation for the suppression of lotteries within its own limits, may properly take into view the evils that inhere in the raising of money in that mode, why may not Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, provide that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another?"

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it was possible for Congress upon this theory to have said, "We will regulate the carrying of lottery tickets; not the transmission into a State where there is a law against the lottery, but in all other States it shall be perfectly legitimate"?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; I think perhaps they could; not in just that way. But I think Congress could have said, "Interstate commerce in lottery tickets is hereby prohibited as to all those transactions where the tickets are to be introduced into a State in violation of the laws of such State."

The CHAIRMAN. I differ absolutely from you there. They say it was a pollution of commerce. It was inherently upon the same basis as diseased cattle or as rags infected with yellow fever. It was inherently a polluted article. We might do that in regard to liquor.

Mr. CALDWELL. Take the cattle case. Cattle may be perfectly healthful. The quarantine line runs through my State, and you know that Congress, in its interstate-commerce quarantine regulations, cooperates with the States. There is no conflict in the quarantine laws. They are so made that there shall be harmony, but they are not uniform. Different States may have different quarantine laws and regulations, but they articulate together, and there is no friction. Suppose there is a car of Texas cattle south of the quarantine line in Oklahoma and they are perfectly healthful. If you were to litigate the question in a court, it could be proven beyond doubt that they are perfectly free from Texas fever or otherwise. The regulation is that before they cross that line they must be dipped, which puts one to trouble and expense. They can not be introduced into interstate commerce across that line until they are dipped. That prevents undipped cattle, no matter how healthful they are, from entering interstate commerce.

Mr. MOON. It is a uniform regulation?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a distinction that that is a preservative regulation and not a prohibition.

Mr. CALDWELL. Exactly so; just as this is. In other words, we take into consideration that the dipping of cattle has some relation to the prevention of the spreading of disease. Suppose the regulation was that they could not be shipped in interstate commerce unless a string were tied around the tail of each one. That would be unconstitutional; that would be void, because it could not have any possible connection with the prevention of the spread of disease; and that is the limitation, as I take it, upon the police power, and that is the thing that Congress can very properly look to in the regulation of interstate commerce. I think I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say this morning something about Congress doing a particular thing in the exercise of its police power.

Mr. MOON. I was about to say, so far as the interstate commerce is concerned, that power in the United States Congress is absolutely plenary; it is all gone out of the States, including the police power. Congress possesses the only power—I do not know that I should put it this way—but the police power is in Congress respecting interstate commerce. Judge Johnson said it was in Congress just as absolutely as though we were not a dual government, but we were one government; that the States had reserved nothing respecting interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think we would, perhaps, get to the same place; but, as a matter of constitutional law, I can not agree that the States delegated any of their police powers, or that, strictly speaking, Congress has any police powers.

Mr. CARLIN. Did not the Supreme Court say in the Lottery case that when the States delegated their powers over interstate commerce to Congress they necessarily delegated with it the police power over commerce that the States had previously possessed?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think not. I think, in effect, that may be so.

Mr. CARLIN. That is exactly the language of the court. Have you the opinion there?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have not the full opinion. But Congress can take that into consideration.

Mr. CARLIN. It will not do to say that that is so, in the face of the opinion.

Mr. CALDWELL. If they say that I have no objection to it, it supports my case.

Mr. FLOYD. Will you permit me to interrupt you right on that point?

Mr. CALDWELL. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD. If the States did not delegate to Congress a portion of their police powers, then what is to prevent the State, in the exercise of its police power, from interfering with interstate commerce?

Mr. CALDWELL. Because the Supreme Court of the United States has said that where the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comes in conflict with a police power of the State, the power of Congress to regulate commerce is supreme. If the States delegated all that power there could not be any conflict.

Mr. CARLIN. I was trying to get into your mind what I have in mind in reference to the Lottery case—that the Supreme Court there based its decision upon the idea that a police regulation was necessary, and then it took up the question as to whether they had the power to hold that, as the States had delegated to Congress all their powers over interstate commerce, it necessarily carried with it the police power of the States over that particular subject of interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is a question of nomenclature, is it not? If they have the power, what more would you want?

Mr. MOON. I think it is a very vital question.

Mr. CARLIN. It may be helpful to you in your view of the case——

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think we have to go so far as to say that Congress has police powers. I think the Federal Government's power is a delegated power. But the power over interstate commerce was all conferred. I say that the State can so regulate interstate commerce as to absolutely prohibit commerce in intoxicating liquors. Therefore, by way of analogy, I see no reason why Congress can not so regulate interstate commerce, where it has all the power, as to absolutely prohibit commerce in intoxicating liquor. But this bill does not go that far. This bill does not undertake to strike down a legitimate transaction; it only strikes down an illegitimate transaction.

Mr. LITTLETON. It will come to the point where every State in the Union will take action—I do not mean every State, but substantially all the States—until there are only one or two States where liquor can be sold. As it begins gradually to increase, the contraband character of this part of interstate commerce continues; and, finally, the question would be reached, sooner or later, as to what the final, ultimate power of Congress was over the prohibition of the entry of intoxicating liquor into the channels of trade.

Mr. CALDWELL. As fast as the States legislate, yes; and the States can go as fast as they please. That brings us, perhaps, to the illustration which was attributed to Mr. Dinwiddie by Mr. Maxwell, that this thing will expand and contract as the States legislate. But that reminds me of a little story that I read when I was studying German in college, I think "Der Fluch der Schoenheit"—the Curse of Beauty. Mr. Maxwell seems to think the beauty about this law is going to be a curse upon it and in some way destroy it. I trust it will not be so bad as that.

Mr. LITTLETON. I was going to follow the first question I asked you by a second one. I asked you if you thought Congress had the power to absolutely prohibit any interstate traffic in liquors, and you have answered plainly that you think so.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLETON. But you say this bill does not go that far; and that is true. You say the object of this bill is to prohibit interstate traffic in liquor where the use of the liquor intended is an unlawful use in the State to which it is sent.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLETON. Can you describe the accompanying attributes of that kind of commerce which would be sufficient to enable Congress to intelligently legislate, so that it would have a foundation upon which to legislate? Do you think the mere naked intent in the hidden domain of the motive of the consignor or consignee, or either, would be sufficient upon which to predicate a regulation or prohibition in any particular instance?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think that is pretty well settled law in this respect. Take this question of abating the nuisance. It is property, unless it is kept or possessed with intent to violate the law. But suppose a stranger has appropriated my case of whisky and he intends to sell it in violation of law. If it is seized in his hands, if he has wrongfully taken possession of my case of whisky, my property ought not to be confiscated to punish him, he being a wrongdoer in the first instance. So I think that it is settled law that, if I came into court at the hearing and showed that, I would be entitled to the return of my property. But suppose he is my servant, and I say to him, "Here, George, take my case of whisky up to the house," but, instead of obeying my order, George dodges down the alley here, or sends somebody else out, and goes peddling out my case of whisky, and the officer comes along and takes George and my case of whisky. I will not attempt to cite the authorities, but the law is settled—I make that statement without fear of successful contradiction—that in that case, having intrusted my liquor with my servant, and he having violated the law with it, his unlawful use of it and his unlawful intent would impress it with the character of a nuisance, and I would lose my case of whisky. So with the shipper. The liquor is shipped, say, under this law, and I see no reason to differentiate. That is, it has been suggested what must the vendor do? To be safe he must get his money in advance, and I see no objection to that. Furthermore, the carrier to be safe must get its pay in advance.

But I have here a quotation from Bowman v. Chicago & North Western Railway Co. (125 U. S., 465), a case cited by Mr. Maxwell this morning; and also quoting a "sagacious" statement by Mr. Justice Catron in the License cases, which I think settles exactly what the procedure would be.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Caldwell, just one minute. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that Mr. Caldwell has exceeded the time occupied by Mr. Maxwell by 12 minutes. Perhaps we have interrupted him a little more than we did Mr. Maxwell.

Mr. MOON. I think we ought to permit the gentleman to conclude.

The CHAIRMAN I agree with that; but what I want to say is that as soon as you conclude the point you are now on I would like to have you come back and discuss more fully than you have the proposition advanced by Mr. Maxwell that this is a delegation of power.

Mr. CALDWELL. I shall be glad to give the committee all the assistance I can, and I realize how you are pressed for time. I shall endeavor to be as brief as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. I will say to you in this connection that we are likely to be called back to the House at any time, judging from the experience of the last several days. About this time in the evening they may have a roll call or something that may take us back there.

Mr. CALDWELL. The committee, I think, will appreciate that there are many minds working against my ideas here, but, of course, I will try to be as brief as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has treated you exactly as it has others, Mr. Caldwell, and perhaps with a little more deference than it has most attorneys. It has had attorneys here on other bills who have hardly been allowed to make 10 minutes' talk uninterrupted. We have shot them to pieces with questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not mean that as a criticism. I appreciate questions from the committee, because while I do not wish to even assume that I know all there is to be known about this, I did come from Oklahoma to Washington hoping that, at least, I could give the committee the view that the people in Oklahoma have of this question; and I can not do that unless you question me.

The CHAIRMAN. I may say that your address so far has been very instructive and illuminating and interesting to the committee.

Mr. CALDWELL. I shall understand, then, that if it becomes necessary for the committee to adjourn, the chairman will simply say so, and I will proceed until the suggestion is made by the chairman.

I think the point I was discussing was directed more particularly to the operation of this bill should it be incorporated into law. I quote now from Bowman v. Chicago & North Western Railway Co.:

"Doubtless the States have power to provide by law suitable measures to prevent the introduction into the States of articles of trade which, on account of their existing condition, would bring in and spread disease, pestilence, and death, such as rags or other substances infected with the germs of yellow fever or the virus of smallpox, or cattle or meat or other provisions that are diseased or decayed, or otherwise, from their condition and quality, unfit for human use or consumption. Such articles are not merchantable; they are not legitimate subjects of trade and commerce. They may be rightly outlawed as intrinsically and directly the immediate sources and causes of destruction to human health and life. The self-protecting power of each State therefore may be rightfully exerted against their introduction, and such exercises of power can not be considered regulations of commerce prohibited by the Constitution. Upon this point the observations of Mr. Justice Catron in the License cases (46 U. S.; 5 How., 504, 599; 12:256, 299) are very much to the point. Speaking of the police power, as reserved to the States and its relation to the power granted to Congress over commerce, he said: 'The assumption is that the police power was not touched by the Constitution'—if that is so, it is still with the States—"'but left to the States, as the Constitution found it. This is admitted; and whenever a thing, from character or condition, is of a description to be regulated by that power in the State, then the regulation may be made by the State, and Congress can not interfere. But this must always depend on facts subject to legal ascertainment, so that the injured may have redress. And the fact must find its support in this: Whether the prohibited article belongs to and is subject to be regulated as a part of foreign commerce or of commerce among the States. If, from its nature, it does not belong to commerce, or if its condition, from putrescence or other cause, is such when it is about to enter the State that it no longer belongs to commerce or, in other words, is not a commercial article, then the State power may exclude its introduction. And as an incident to this power, a State may use means to ascertain the fact.'"

Mr. WEBB. That is as regards national legislation?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; if Congress shall say, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce, that liquor intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is being introduced is not interstate commerce, although it may be in the channels of interstate commerce; in other words, liquor so intended is not a legitimate article of commerce any more than drugs adulterated or misbranded since the food and drugs act, then I take it the State has power to do with them as they please, not because Congress has delegated any power to the State, but because Congress has said those things are not interstate commerce, and not being interstate commerce, naturally they fall in the field of the State police power and not in the field of interstate commerce.

Mr. LITTLETON. Just there, the State, in the cases you put here, has branded liquor as being unworthy of a place in its commerce, and it is the opinion of the State that attaches to the liquor that makes it objectionable to the commerce in your State, and that opinion is expressed by your State laws. In the case of the diseased or putrescent articles of which you spoke, no State branded them, no government proscribed them; the disease and infirmity inhered in the article, and therefore, because of that, they were subject to the general regulative power of Congress. In the case you put, could Congress, because the State in its opinion has branded an article thus and so, reject it out of the channels of interstate commerce without any opinion of its own denouncing it as unfit for interstate commerce?

Mr. CALDWELL. It certainly can—intoxicating liquor. I want to finish this application. Suppose this law is passed and the liquor arrives at the Santa Fe station in Oklahoma City—I use my original illustration—and a warrant is sworn out. Get away from this idea that I find throughout the hearings that the minute they come across the State line some officer, some goblin, is going to be there to board the train and summarily take them and destroy them. Due process of law prohibits all that. The State machinery can not move against that liquor except in accordance with due process of law. No search warrant can issue in Oklahoma except upon affidavit, supported by affirmation or oath, so that some one must go before a magistrate and swear out a warrant, swear to facts which show that the liquors are there and somebody intends to use them in violation of the law. Justice Catron said—which remark was quoted in the Rahrer case with approval—that if the fact exists which excludes things from interstate commerce, the State has power to use means to ascertain that fact. If the intention to use them in violation of the laws of the State excludes them from interstate commerce, the State may issue a warrant, may arrest the liquor and bring it into the State tribunal and try it, and if it is found it is intended to be used in violation of the law it is not interstate commerce. They can not then come in and say that "we intend to use that in violation of the law," because if they do that they confess their whole case under this law.

The only defense they could have is, "We did not intend this liquor for use in violation of any of the laws of the State of Oklahoma"; and if they did not intend to use it in violation of the laws of the State of Oklahoma it would not be a nuisance. But they say, "We have this liquor; it was in the channels of interstate commerce." We say, "Yes; but Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate interstate commerce, has said there shall be no interstate commerce in liquor intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is introduced."

I cite in these cases a case from Maine, which I think is good law and which is analogous. The food and drugs act prohibits from interstate commerce food or drugs that are misbranded within the meaning of that law. A quantity of liquor was shipped from Boston to some place in Maine and seized in the hands of the carrier. In other words, they were arrested and brought into court, and it was asked that they be delivered back to the carrier because they were interstate commerce; that is, they were in the channels of interstate commerce. They had not been delivered to the consignee under the contract of interstate shipment. But the State traversed that claim by saying, "These liquors are not interstate commerce, because they are adulterated and misbranded in violation of the food and drugs act, and therefore Congress has said they can not be interstate commerce." The issue being found that they were adulterated and misbranded, all of those liquors which were adulterated and misbranded were forfeited, even though the seizures were made in the hands of the carrier.

Mr. MOON. For an inherent infirmity in the article in question.

Mr. CALDWELL. But not so inherent that they could have done that if Congress had not passed the food and drugs act.

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. CALDWELL. So far as the inherent power to do damage, to corrupt morals, and injure the public welfare are concerned, it is well established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that that applies to all interstate commerce. And therefore I say that Congress, so far as intoxicating liquor is concerned, can make regulations respecting liquor in interstate commerce.

More directly answering your question, Mr. LITTLETON, it has been suggested here—and I want to add just one or two things to it—that section 242 of the game law is directly in point. I must take issue with the learned gentleman, who stated here this morning that there is no such thing as property in wild game, even though reduced to possession, at common law. You gentlemen are all lawyers, and you can judge between us. I have not the authorities here, but I make this statement, that at common law if I go upon the chase and I am fortunate enough to kill a deer, and I bring that deer home and dress it and put the venison in my smokehouse, and some one comes at night and steals the venison out of my smokehouse, he has stolen my property, and at common law he can be prosecuted for larceny.

Another illustration: I go upon the chase; I kill a fox, and take his pelt and make it into a rug and put it upon my floor. It is my property because I have converted it to possession. I say the limitation is this, that if I capture wild animals and keep them as pets or for curiosities in their wild state, as deer in my park or animals in my zoological garden, if I might have one, at common law, although I have them in captivity, yet in life they are not property. That is the limitation. This law applies to the dead bodies of animals, to the venison and quail, after they are killed. I have in mind a case that went up from Oklahoma, from Blaine County, where the agent of a railroad company was indicted, tried, and convicted because he shipped through interstate commerce, billed out, certain egg cases, which contained quail, and he knew nothing about the contents of the cases.

Talk about drastic regulation; you gentlemen will remember—those of you who were here when the penal code provisions were up—how, in every one of those provisions that related to intoxicating liquor, they were limited by "knowingly." No express agent, no railroad company, no carrier, can violate those provisions about shipping or misbranding liquor unless it is done "knowingly," and you read section 242 and find if that limitation is in there:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to deliver to any common carrier for transportation, or for any common carrier to transport from any State, Territory, etc., any dead bodies."

Not "knowingly transport." We are not asking that you go to the extremes to which you have gone with reference to the game laws. There are men being prosecuted frequently for violation of that statute, and put into Federal jails and penitentiaries. If this law is unconstitutional, I respectfully submit that the report recommending that these bills do not pass because they are unconstitutional carry with it a bill repealing these laws, because they are also unconstitutional, and men are being sent to jail every month for violating them.

I refer to section 245. In its language it is nearer to—I think quite in point with—the language of these bills.

"Whoever shall bring or cause to be brought into the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof"—

That is not the part I had in mind.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. The middle part of that contains the interstate reference.

Mr. CALDWELL. "Or shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier, for carriage from one State"—this applies to the shipper—"from one State, Territory, or District of the United States to another State, District, etc., any drug, medicine, article, or thing designed, adapted, or intended for immoral uses"—and then it winds up by saying—"or immoral use."

Whoever delivers to a carrier for transportation from one State to another State any thing or article, I do not care whether it is essentially or inherently vicious and bad, it may have many legal, lawful, and legitimate uses, but which is intended for an immoral use in the State into which it is sought to be introduced, it is a crime to send it through interstate commerce.

Mr. WEBB. The white-slave law, passed three or four years ago, punishes a man for intent.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is because the article is intended for an immoral use in the State into which it is sought to be introduced.

Mr. DAVIS. Are the laws of that State the criterion of the immorality?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; it might not be a violation of the law of the State.

Mr. DAVIS. Does not the act there denounce it as a Federal denunciation, and not leave the law of the State as the sole criterion of the legality or the illegality of it?

Mr. CALDWELL. That comes to the other proposition, which, perhaps, we would just as well take up now. For example, take section 289, with reference to crimes, acts committed in places within a State which are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government—the Federal buildings, for example. Those sites are condemned and the buildings are built there and thus come under the Federal jurisdiction. The State can not tax them and the State can not operate on them. Let us get section 289:

"Whoever within the territorial limits of any State, organized Territory, or District, but within or upon any of the places now existing or hereafter reserved or acquired, described in section 272 of this act, shall do or omit the doing of any act or thing which is not made penal by any law of Congress, but which if committed or omitted within the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or District in which such place is situated, by the laws thereof now in force would be penal, shall be deemed guilty."

Mr. CARLIN. That says "the laws thereof now in force."

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. That does not allow for any repeal or amendment; and is not that in effect the enactment of those laws into a Federal statute?

Mr. CALDWELL. There could be no logical distinction, I think. My suggestion is this, that a Federal building now being erected in Oklahoma City, the site having been condemned, is Federal property; it is under Federal jurisdiction. A man might go into that Federal building, when completed, and sell intoxicating liquor, and he would be guilty of a crime, because the laws of Oklahoma make it a crime to sell intoxicating liquor.

Mr. MOON. No; you are mistaken. He could not be punished because the law of Oklahoma made that a crime, except the act of Congress writes that into law. The Supreme Court has absolutely said that by that section we write into our Federal penal laws all the laws of the several States.

Mr. CALDWELL. If that be done, then all you are doing by this act is to write into the Federal laws the penal laws of Oklahoma.

Mr. CARLIN. That act says laws in existence now; that makes a different enactment. It does not leave anything for the future action of the States.

Mr. CALDWELL. Do you think it would be objectionable if it did?

Mr. CARLIN. I am not saying what I think; I am trying to get your view.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say I think it would make no difference if we did.

Mr. MOON. Did what?

Mr. CALDWELL. If we changed laws that had been passed.

Mr. MOON. It has been so said by the Supreme Court about four times. The Supreme Court has declared a similar section unconstitutional, one of them because they attempted to revise the laws of the State after the original law was adopted by Congress. The Supreme Court says that is impossible. We can not delegate to the States the right to the exercise of the criminal laws. Understand, that is territorial jurisdiction wholly; it has nothing to do with these conceded and surrendered powers of Congress. It is the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the case might be distinguished there.

Mr. HOUSTON. That difficulty could be obviated by making it apply to the laws now in existence.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think it is necessary, because section 289 is a penal Federal law, a violation of which must be prosecuted and the punishment imposed in the Federal courts. The Webb bill is a regulation of commerce merely; it provides no penalty.

Mr. MOON. You are right. There is no analogy between the two cases at all.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am not ready to say there is no analogy. I think there is analogy in this, that on all these points in this dual form of government the Federal jurisdiction is meeting the State jurisdiction, and they are seeking to work out a system whereby they can punish all offenders, prohibit all wrongdoing, work to the general common welfare, and articulate together without conflict. In the liquor laws that has not been reched, and, so far as prohibition States are concerned, all they are asking is that Congress so regulate interstate commerce as to arrive at the situation where there will not be a conflict in jurisdiction, and if liquor, which is intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is to be introduced, is taken out of interstate commerce, conflict will no longer arise.

The question was asked this morning, and the suggestion made, as to what effect this law would have on liquor in transit through a prohibition State. I say absolutely none at all. It would have none at all, and the most that could ever happen would be that some one, either mistakenly or by willfully perjuring himself, should go before a magistrate and swear out a warrant, and that the magistrate, being thus imposed upon, should issue a warrant commanding the officer to search an express car, or a train, and that in that search he should take liquor which was in transit through the State. But what would be the result upon the hearing? The liquor was intended for and was a shipment from one State through this State to another State, so it could not possibly be intended for violation of the laws of the State of jurisdiction, and it would not come within the law. Furthermore, one State never enforces the penal laws of another State. Suppose it is going from Missouri through Kansas into Texas; and imagine that Texas is dry, as it will be. It makes no difference, so far as Oklahoma is concerned, what they are intending to do with it down in Texas. Oklahoma does not enforce the penal laws of Texas. In the case of Wisconsin v. Insurance Co. a foreign insurance company did business in the State of Wisconsin in violation of the laws of Wisconsin, thereby subjecting itself to a penalty. The State of Wisconsin brought suit and got a judgment for the penalty. Then the insurance company, having withdrawn from the State, the State of Wisconsin sought to enforce that judgment through the Federal courts, and the Supreme Court of the United States, applying the rule that one jurisdiction never enforces the penal laws of another jurisdiction, said they had no jurisdiction of the case, and that they would even look behind the judgment obtained by Wisconsin to determine that that judgment was for the recovery of a penalty. So that there is no possibility of any trouble about the shipment that is going entirely through the State.

But there ought to be no exception along that line, because this would happen. In Indian Territory, before statehood, it was a felony to introduce liquor into the Indian Territory—the Five Civilized Tribes—but that was done, and done repeatedly. Liquor would be billed from Gainesville, Tex., or from Fort Worth, Tex., through to a point in Kansas; or from Missouri to a point in Kansas, and the information would be given out. They would be all ready. The information would be given out, and before the train arrived the liquor dealer, the violater of the law, the criminal, would go into the Federal court and swear out a writ of replevin, and the officer would meet the train at the depot with a writ of replevin, and go into the car and replevy the liquor. Nobody had introduced it. The man who had shipped it intended it to go to Texas, and the railroad company received it for shipment to Texas. That is the way they did it frequently, and, of course, if they had a chance under this bill they would do it again. Now, what has happened in Oklahoma? The circuit court of appeals a short time ago held that the laws of Congress, the Federal laws, are still in force as to all that part of Oklahoma which was Indian country before statehood, and that it is still a crime against the Federal Government to introduce liquor into that Indian Territory part of it. So some one showed me just the other day a press notice from an Oklahoma paper, since I left home, with a big headline, where they did exactly that thing at Muskogee. The express company, the railroad company, will not now receive shipments into those parts of Oklahoma which were Indian country before statehood. Here is the press notice:

"CARS OF LIQUOR ROUTED THROUGH OKLAHOMA ARE EMPTIED AT ICING DEPOTS.

"INTERSTATE COMMERCE LAW BECOMES FIRST AID OF SCHEMING MERCHANTS IN EVADING FEDERAL COURT RULE FORBIDDING SHIPMENTS.

"MUSKOGEE, OKLA., February 24.

"The decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of St. Louis forbidding the introduction of intoxicating liquors for any purpose into what formerly was Indian Territory, now the east half of Oklahoma, and the home of the Five Civilized Tribes, has developed ingenious schemes to evade the law. An odd one was lately discovered by the agents of a railroad.

"A carload of liquor, billed from Fort Smith, Ark., to Kansas City, Mo., was routed in a roundabout way and delivered by one railroad to another at Arkansas City, Kans. The car was hauled to Kansas City firmly sealed, but when delivery to the consignee was attemped the car was empty; not even a cork was in sight.

"The railroad agent was puzzled and prepared for a demand for damages from the consignee. The agents delivered the freight bill with the explanation that as the car was empty it would be proper to file a claim for the loss. To the agent's surprise, the consignee gave him a check for the full amount of freight and told him that there would be no claim for shortage.

"The railroad company, in the meantime, had asigned one of its best detectives to the task of learning what had become of the carload of liquor. Before he reported, a second car of liquor—also empty—was received and the freight bill paid without protest. A third car came before the detective reported.

"When the detective returned he told an unusual story. He had learned that the waybill issued at Fort Smith had been marked: 'Stop at Muskogee for ice.' The liquor was intact when the car reached Muskogee; it is thought to have been missing when it left that city.

"The cleverness of the trick lies in the fact that the consignment to Kansas City, according to law, is an interstate shipment and can not be molested by Oklahoma officers during transit through this State. Nor was there prohibition of the car being stopped for icing. As an interstate shipment, the liquor could not be refused by the railroad company, though it would be in violation of law to carry liquor to points in old Indian Territory.

"There is humor in the fact that when the shipments were made Kansas City with icing instruction blizzard weather prevailed in Oklahoma."

Mr. CARLIN. I want to direct your attention to this idea, which is in the minds of a good many members of the committee: I think we will probably agree that Congress has the right to regulate interstate commerce, and some would go so far, at least as to some articles, as to say that Congress has the right to prohibit interstate commerce. But the question is, Does this bill of itself do either? Does it regulate or prohibit? Does it not depend upon the action of the State to give this bill life and vitality, and not upon the act of Congress itself?

Mr. FLOYD. Not only that, not only upon the action of the State, but also upon the intention of the party who is to receive the liquor, in addition to the action of the State.

Mr. CALDWELL. It certainly depends upon the intention of the party, and I see no objection to that.

Mr. MCCOY. With Mr. Caldwell's consent, I would like to put this proposition to him: You say if this liquor is taken out of interstate commerce—in other words, if Congress says it is not an article of interstate commerce—the State can handle the proposition. Now, is not the very question which we are to decide, in the constitutional aspect of it, whether or not Congress can say that it is not a legitimate article of interstate commerce. Is not that the very question at issue?

Mr. CALDWELL. That is one question, and virtually the three questions go to the same point.

Mr. CARLIN. My question is this, whether, if we pass this act, there is anything in the act itself that would either regulate or prohibit the interstate shipment of liquor?

Mr. HOUSTON. Or, in other words, does it delegate to the State power to make a regulation?

Mr. CARLIN. Does the act derive its vitality from the State? We have not been able to get you to discuss that. We want to get your idea on that.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let me try it now. The State does not give it life and effect. It is clearly a regulation by Congress, because Congress speaks. And what do they speak? They say that the power to regulate commerce under the Constitution of the United States is full, complete, and absolute. Now, if it is, Congress has the power to keep the channels of interstate commerce clean. They have got the power to keep out of the channels of interstate commerce anything which, for the public welfare, for the common good, ought to be kept out.

Mr. CARLIN. We are admitting the power of Congress, for the sake of this question, to regulate and prohibit and do all these things which you say it has the power to do. But where in this bill does Congress attempt to make out a regulation or prohibition which is not dependent upon the action of some other legislative authority?

Mr. CALDWELL. Why can not Congress lay down a regulation which is dependent upon the action of the States? What is the objection to that?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the point, right there. Is that a delegation of the power to the States?

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the point I want to get at.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; because Congress can say for that reason it shall not be interstate commerce. True, as the Supreme Court said in Mugler v. Kansas, that is always subject to review.

Mr. CARLIN. The Webb bill does not say that.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; it does.

Mr. CARLIN. "The shipment or transportation, in any manner," etc., is prohibited. The second clause of the Sheppard bill does go as far as you are intimating you would like to go now. The Sheppard bill has a second section.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; it has a second section.

Mr. CARLIN. The Webb bill has not.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the title of the Webb bill is misleading and not logical, because it says, "To divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases." The title of the other bill states what is sought to be accomplished. The Sheppard bill says, "To prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases"—not absolutely.

That which is sought to be accomplished is to prohibit interstate traffic in certain cases. What are the cases? What are the limitations that Congress is imposing? The limitation is this: It is liquor that is intended by the person introducing it to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is being introduced. What objection is there? That does not delegate anything to the State. It simply says that you shall not, through the channels of interstate commerce, carry into a State a thing which you intend, or any other person connected with you in the transaction intends, to use in violation of the laws of that State.

Mr. CARLIN. Then, suppose the States adopted regulations; is it not your idea that this bill would make those regulations applicable; such as one providing for seizure, for instance?

Mr. CALDWELL. Here would be the test: It would be interstate commerce or it would not be interstate commerce just as it was intended or was not intended to violate a State law with it.

Mr. CARLIN. But the test is whether it is State regulation or interstate regulation.

Mr. CALDWELL. The State has nothing to do with it. The State is not required to pass any law; only, if the State has a valid law, we simply say that inasmuch as the power to regulate commerce is supreme to the police powers of the several States, therefore in the regulation of interstate commerce we will so regulate it as not to infringe upon or interfere with those police powers.

Mr. MOON. Suppose a large order comes to a liquor house in the city of Philadelphia; they are asked to ship several barrels of liquor. They must say, "Where is it going?" "It is going to Oklahoma." "Well, the laws of the State of Oklahoma will not permit a shipment to that State, at all."

Here is another order that is going to the State of Illinois. "What is the law of the State of Illinois?" "The law of the State of Illinois does not attempt to make it a criminal offense or a penal offense, or does not attempt to sacrifice that whisky if it is going to be sold, and therefore we can ship it into the State of Illinois. We can not ship it into the State of Oklahoma."

In other words, venders must look to the laws of the various States, and the laws of the various States absolutely regulate the power of shipment in interstate commerce. I do not see how you can get away from that. You said a moment ago that the laws of the States had nothing to do with it. I say they absolutely control it. I do not pretend to say what the consequence of that is; I am only inquiring about that fact.

Mr. CALDWELL. If there are no objectionable consequences, I do not see the objection.

Mr. MOON. To my mind the objectionable consequences are not only objectionable but absolutely fatal. It is absolutely unthinkable.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let us take the case of Graves v. Johnson, the opinion in which was written by Mr. Justice Holmes before he was appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States, in which a liquor vender in Massachusetts sold liquor to a party—and this is the finding of the court—"with a view to being used in violation of the laws of the State of Maine." That was the extent of the participation on the part of the vender. Suit was brought in a Massachusetts court for the purchase price of the liquor. The defense was the illegality of the contract, and Mr. Justice Holmes held that the liquor vender could not recover, and he quoted from Pollock on Contracts. I think there is a difference between the rule in this country and in England, and the rule goes further there than in this country, but it is well-settled law in England, and the court announced this rule, that where a contract is made with a view to violating the laws of another State, that contract is absolutely void.

This sale was made with a view that the liquor should be resold in violation of the laws of the State of Maine.

Mr. CARLIN. We are trying to get right down to the very inside of this question. You do not contend that there is any power in Congress to transfer to a State the duty which is imposed upon it by the Constitution, do you?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not at all.

Mr. CARLIN. We do know that the Constitution imposes upon Congress not only the privilege but the duty of regulating interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Therefore it is not the duty or the business of anybody else to have anything to do with that?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not at all.

Mr. CARLIN. Therefore if this legislation does have anything to do with that, and Congress undertakes by this bill to place the responsibility of that duty upon anybody else, it will be in violation of that constitutional provision?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. That is what I think Mr. MOON was driving at; that if Congress is vesting in a State a part of that function which belongs to Congress, then it is doing it in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. CALDWELL. But that is the very question.

Mr. CARLIN. That is the very question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Congress is saying this, that liquor, intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is sought to be introduced through the channels of interstate commerce, is prohibited from interstate commerce.

Mr. CARLIN. Would this action of Congress be subject to the future laws of the State, laws enacted after the law of Congress? Suppose your State is a prohibition State, and the shipment of liquor there under the State act, taken in connection with this statute, would be impossible; then if you repealed your State act shipments under this statute would be possible?

Mr. CALDWELL. I suppose so; that is exactly true.

Mr. CARLIN. Would this act be susceptible to the future acts of the various States?

Mr. CALDWELL. It would be affected by them. But why is that not desirable?

Mr. CARLIN. That is not the question, whether it is desirable. Everybody may want it to be so; but the question is, How does that get to be constitutional?

Mr. CALDWELL. Because if Congress has the power to regulate commerce among the States, then Congress can speak with reference to interstate commerce transactions.

Mr. CARLIN. We all agree to that, if it is not prohibited.

Mr. CALDWELL. Here Congress is speaking, and Congress says this may go and that may go, and they say anything with reference to intoxicating liquors may go except those liquors which are intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which they are introduced.

These States are not foreign countries. They do not stand in that relation to the Federal Government. This is one Government of 48 States, and those 48 States, if you please, are not simply local municipalities that exist or not by reason of the power of Congress, but they exist as sovereign States. The truth of the matter is, that the Federal Government exists because of the grant of the sovereign power that is vested in those States. Now, this Congress deals with those States, and it says this—a treaty, if you please—"We will so regulate interstate commerce"——

Mr. CARLIN. You do not mean to contend by that argument that there is any power left in the States to legislate with reference to interstate commerce?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think that the argument infers that. If it does, I am saying that which is foreign to my mind. I have been sort of going around and around here, but I hope that I have not gotten so far that my remarks are as illogical as that.

What I meant to say was this: That if Congress has the power, an absolute power, to regulate interstate commerce, then, to my mind, there are not any limitations upon that absolute power, and now—and this, of course, does go to the object to be sought—shall we or shall we not regulate interstate commerce so as to keep out of the channels of interstate commerce liquor which is expressly intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State into which it is introduced?

Mr. CARLIN. Exactly. Now, would you contend that although Congress has the absolute power which it has to regulate interstate commerce, that would include the power to delegate that to some other legislative authority?

Mr. CALDWELL. But your question assumes something that is not in the case, because where do you get that delegation?

Mr. CARLIN. That is the very fact we are discussing here—whether this act of itself means anything, whether it regulates or prohibits anything, whether it does not require——

Mr. HOUSTON. The argument was made before the committee this morning that this was a delegation of power to the States to enact a prohibitory law.

Mr. CALDWELL. That statement was made?

Mr. HOUSTON. That statement was made.

Mr. CALDWELL. But it was not pointed out to the committee how or wherein it was a delegation of power.

Mr. WEBB. It seems to me that if the bird law, which was indorsed by my friend Judge MOON, a good lawyer, is constitutional, this proposed law is constitutional, too. Suppose no State had any laws against killing birds; then this proposed law would be a mere nullity, because it would regulate nothing. The vitality of the law will depend on the fact whether the law has any force in regulation. North Carolina may have an open and a closed season for shooting birds, and her legislature may meet next year and change that entire season; and if it does the Federal law that is in effect makes it felony to violate that law made next year.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the bird law been confirmed?

Mr. WEBB. It has been to the circuit court of appeals twice and has not been attacked as unconstitutional.

Mr. CALDWELL. Of course, statements can be made, and you can say, "Why is not this a delegation of power?" or, "Why is it a delegation of power?" To say that it is or that it is not does not get anywhere. I have said what it is in its nature, I think.

If it is a delegation of power, I think we should discover that it is by inquiring into how it will operate, what it will do, and the effect of it. I think, as Mr. WEBB says, it operates exactly as the bird law does. If the game is killed in an open season and the State law does not prohibit its being shipped out of the State, then it can be shipped; but if the State of Oklahoma prohibits it it can not be shipped, although the State of Missouri might not prohibit it. I see no objection to its depending on the State law, and I see no delegation of power there. It seems to me that is so because Congress has said it is so; not because the State does anything, but because Congress has so regulated commerce that these things follow from that regulation, and at any time the bill is repealed then the reverse will be so because Congress has spoken.

Mr. CARLIN. This bill of itself would not stop shipments into Oklahoma.

Mr. CALDWELL. Certainly.

Mr. CARLIN. It would not do it, would it? This bill itself does not even attempt to regulate interstate shipments into Oklahoma, does it?

Mr. CALDWELL. Now, I think I catch your point, and you have used the term "interstate shipment," which is not a correct expression. It is interstate commerce. I might have an interstate shipment of putrid meat, but it would not be interstate commerce. So that if this law is passed by Congress there might be an interstate shipment——

Mr. CARLIN. I refer to the interstate shipment of the subject matter which is also interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

Mr. CARLIN. Liquor is now interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is now.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes. Then, if you ship it from one State to another it is a shipment of interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. Not if Congress says it shall not be interstate commerce if it is intended for use in violation of the laws of the State to which it is shipped.

Mr. CARLIN. No.

Mr. CALDWELL. Now, I think we are getting down to your question. Suppose Congress passes this law, and liquor is shipped from some State into the State of Oklahoma which is intended to be used in violation of the laws of Oklahoma. That is not interstate commerce. It is an interstate shipment; it is in the channels of interstate commerce, but it is an outlaw.

Mr. CARLIN. But you contend that Congress can speak with reference to laws not in existence or thought of.

Mr. CALDWELL. I can see no reason why Congress should not speak with reference to what the States, in the exercise of their police power, might do.

Mr. CARLIN. Congress would have to be speaking with prophetic vision of future enactments.

Mr. CALDWELL. Not at all with prophetic vision. They simply say, "This is not interstate commerce if it is intended to be used in violation of law." I think you will agree with me that it is impossible to subject to interstate-commerce law anything if the thing which you are subjecting is not interstate commerce. If Congress has said that it shall not be interstate commerce, then you are not delegating anything, because it is not interstate commerce. And let me suggest that I think that is exactly the logic of the case of Rhodes against Iowa. They said that Congress did not mean to prohibit intoxicating liquors from channels of interstate commerce absolutely because they did not say so, and they said that what they did do was simply to provide that upon arrival at the point of destination and delivery to the consignee the thing should cease to be interstate commerce. Then the police power of the State attached, not because Congress delegated to the States power to do something that they could not do, but because Congress said, "This thing is no longer interstate commerce."

Mr. CARLIN. It would not be interstate commerce in Oklahoma, Congress would be saying, but it would be interstate commerce in Illinois.

Mr. CALDWELL. Why? Because Congress has expressed itself.

Mr. LITTLETON. In other words, your position is that if Congress finds a certain condition in certain portions of the country and deals with that by withdrawing the article from the channels of interstate commerce, if that condition diminishes or increases the whole condition goes together. But Congress is dealing with certain specific conditions in certain States of the Union.

Mr. RUCKER. Is that true?

Mr. CALDWELL. It is.

Mr. RUCKER. Would not this bill be applicable to every State?

Mr. LITTLETON. It would be applicable, but there would be no condition upon which it could operate. As I understand him, he says that Congress finds a certain condition in different States, and, finding that condition, it deals with the condition by saying that a certain article shall be prohibited from entering that particular place as interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; it does not say that. It so legislates that all the States can bring themselves in or not. But as you are legislating to-day you are only dealing with certain States, because all the States have not brought themselves in.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; all the States have laws against the sale of liquor.

Mr. HOUSTON. You are dealing with the violation of the law. The point is that you ship it to the place where it is to be used in violation of law.

Mr. LITTLETON. Now he brings himself down to the point whether regulation of interstate commerce has got to be uniform.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think Mr. CARLIN got pretty close to the proposition that way, and I think the Wilson Act is exactly analogous. The Wilson Act went into effect in August, 1890, and there were States prohibiting the sale of liquor in the original package. Suppose there was a State without any liquor law at all, or that liquor could be shipped into that State and sold in original packages, and there were other States, like Kansas, where it could not be sold. It could be shipped into the State of Kansas, but it could not be sold. Under the Wilson Act it ceased to be interstate commerce upon delivery, although it remained in the original package; and since it was no longer interstate commerce the State of Kansas could prohibit the sale of it in the original package.

I know the early decisions of the court are confusing, and you must remember that it was a suggestion made by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Leisy against Hardin, that suggested the idea of passing the Wilson law. But the court was confused in the beginning. They have gotten the law down now where I think this is settled, that you can not delegate power to the States. Congress can not do that, but Congress can regulate commerce, and Congress can say, if this thing is intended to be used in violation of the laws of any State into which it is sought to be introduced, then it is not interstate commerce. It may become an interstate shipment, but it is not interstate commerce, and it has no right in interstate commerce; and that is so because Congress has spoken, and not because Congress has delegated any power anywhere. It is because Congress has said that is not interstate commerce.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. May I ask a brief question of Mr. Caldwell?

The CHAIRMAN. You may.

Mr. CARLIN. If the question does not provoke a long argument.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. It bears exactly on the point you have all been interrogating him on.

Mr. CARLIN. All right.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. Is there not this further thing to be said along that line, that this enactment is a direct enactment by Congress full and complete in itself, and not depending at all upon the legislation of any State for its vitality, in that Congress does settle the rule of interstate commerce; and if it passes this bill and makes the rule—that is, that intoxicating liquor shipped in interstate commerce, the object of which is the violation of the laws of the State into which it is shipped, shall be prohibited, that is the rule of Congress; it depends upon no act of any State; and the fact that some States may not have legislation that pertains to any intoxicating liquor does not affect the vitality of the law?

The CHAIRMAN. I thought you were going to ask a question.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. I am asking it and explaining it as I ask it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLIN. Will you answer that question?

Mr. DINWIDDIE. Furthermore——

The CHAIRMAN. I think the committee had better adjourn.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. I will ask this, if you will allow me. Is not this to be compared with the local-option enactment of a State, which is a complete, full enactment by the legislature, but whose enforcement and application is dependent upon a state of facts determined by a subsequent vote of the people?

Mr. MOON. May I ask you a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. May I answer this question?

The CHAIRMAN. I think Mr. Caldwell is entitled to answer that question, if he can unwind it.

Mr. CARLIN. If you can unscramble that egg you can answer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the Webb bill and the Sheppard bill are both clear regulations of interstate commerce by Congress. I think that they delegate nothing to the States, and that with the reason and the policy of the law the courts have nothing to do; and they have said so many times. Congress speaks; and the act, if passed, will have just that force and effect which the language of the act means and conveys. Congress is acting. Then it will be a question, Is this interstate commerce; and if not, why not? Because Congress has said that a thing so situated as this thing is situated shall not constitute interstate commerce. Liquor so situated, then, I say, is not property, but a nuisance.

Mr. MOON. What, then, becomes of Mr. Dinwiddie's beautiful theory that it expands and contracts with the laws of the States?

Mr. CALDWELL. That, as Chief Justice White says of Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in Brown v. Maryland, is one of the "incidents" of the legislation.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, because several Members have requested me to do so, I now have printed in the RECORD the report made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] on the pending bill:

[House Report No. 1461, Sixty-second Congress, third session.]

DIVESTING INTOXICATING LIQUORS OF THEIR INTERSTATE CHARACTER IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 17593:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17593) entitled "An act to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases" have considered the same and report thereon with the recommendation that the bill be passed with the following amendments:

Page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "including beer, ale, or wine."

Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "noncontinuous" and insert the word "noncontiguous."

Page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction."

Page 2, line 2, at the end of said line, strike out the word "or" and the word "kept" in the beginning of line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sold."

Page 2, lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, strike out the words "enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such States, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "prohibited," strike out the semicolon and insert a period, and after the word "prohibited," in line 9, strike out the remainder of line 9 and all of lines 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16.

This bill is intended to withdraw the protecting hand of interstate commerce from intoxicating liquors transported into a State or Territory and intended to be used therein in violation of the law of such State or Territory. Few words will suffice to justify the policy of such a bill. Before the Wilson Act of 1890, any person had the right, not only to have intoxicating liquors transported to him from without the State, but also to sell such liquors in the original package. The decision of the court in Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) held that the consignee of such liquor had the right to sell it in the original package under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. The Supreme Court held in the case of Rhodes v. Iowa that the Wilson law deprived the consignee of such liquor of the right to sell it in the original package, or otherwise, in violation of the law of the State.

Therefore, under the present law and decisions, no State can interfere with the interstate shipment of liquor until it has been actually delivered to the consignee, and because of this present state of the law no State official is permitted to touch any interstate shipment of liquor consigned to a "blind tiger," "bootlegger," or "speak-easy" until after it has been delivered to such violator of the State law.

To illustrate, some time ago there were three packages of liquor shipped into a town in a near-by State, consigned to individuals of doubtful character, one of whom had previously been convicted of selling liquor in violation of the law of the State.

One of the packages was a barrel containing 500 half-pint bottles of liquor, another was a barrel containing 250 pint bottles of liquor, and the third was a barrel containing 140 quarts of liquor. Owing to the character of the packages and the reputation of the consignees, the civil authorities were morally certain that these three packages of liquor were going to be used in violation of the State laws as soon as the consignees received them. This liquor was in the territory of a sovereign State and within the jurisdiction of its sovereign laws, and yet not one of her officers dared touch the liquor while it remained in the express office and undelivered. The sacred law of interstate commerce protected these shipments of "blind-tiger" liquor from molestation by State officers, not only while in transit, not only while they remained in the express office or depot, but also until they were actually delivered to those who intended to violate the State laws.

This bill, if enacted into law, would permit the State officers, under such circumstances, to seize such liquor under a proper warrant and try it upon the question of whether it was intended to be used in violation of the laws of the State, and if the jury should find that it was so intended the delivery to the consignee would be prevented and the liquor confiscated. Surely there can be no objection to such a law. This bill might well be styled a local-option act to give the various States the power to control the liquor traffic as to them may seem best. It would remove the shackles of interstate-commerce law from the action of the States and discontinue the handicap under which they now labor, in enforcing their police regulations, and leave them freer to break up the "blind tigers" and "bootleggers" that infest many "dry" States.

Congress has the power to enact this bill into law. The regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with Indian tribes is completely reposed in the Congress of the United States by article 1, section 8, clause 3 of the Constitution. The power to regulate includes the power to prohibit, as is shown by a long line of decisions of the Supreme Court and by a long line of Federal laws which have never been attacked. In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 189) Chief Justice Marshall, in discussing the power of Congress over commerce, says:

"It is the power to regulate—that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to these objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions in the exercise of its power as found in the Constitution of the United States."

In the case of United States v. Marigold (9 How., 560) Justice Daniel makes it clear that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to prohibit. He says:

"Under the commerce clause every subject falling within the legitimate sphere of commercial regulation may be partially or wholly excluded. The power of exclusion may operate on any and every subject of commerce to which the legislative expression may apply."

The same plenary power which Congress has over foreign commerce, by reason of the commerce clause of the Constitution, is given Congress over commerce with the Indian tribes, as was held in the case of United States v. 43 Gallons of Whisky (93 U. S., 188), construing a statute prohibiting the shipment of whisky into the county of Polk, in the State of Minnesota.

The court in this case says:

"Congress, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, but extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by the Indians."

Congress now has the exclusive and absolute power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes.

"It would be strange indeed," says Judge Davis in this opinion, "if the commercial power lodged solely with Congress, and unrestrained as it is by State lines, did not extend to the exclusion of spirituous liquors intended to corrupt the Indians, not only from the existing Indian country, but from that which has ceased to be so."

(See also the case of United States v. Brigantine Williams, decided in 1808.)

In the Rahrer case Chief Justice Fuller says:

"By the adoption of the Constitution the ability of the several States to act upon the matter solely in accordance with their own will was extinguished and the legislative will of the General Government substituted. No affirmative guaranty was hereby given to any State of the right to demand, as between it and the others, what it could not have obtained before; while the object was undoubtedly sought to be attained of preventing commercial regulations partial in their character or contrary to the common interests. And the magnificent growth and prosperity of the country attest the success which has attended the accomplishment of that object. But this furnishes no support to the position that Congress could not, in the exercise of the discretion reposed in it, concluding that the common interests did not require entire freedom in the traffic in ardent spirits, enact the law in question."

In the Addison Pipe Co. case (175 U. S.), involving the antitrust law, the court says:

"The reasons which might have caused the framers of the Constitution to repose the power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress do not, however, offset or limit the extent of the power itself. In Gibbons v. Ogden the power was declared to be complete in itself and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution."

In 1895 Congress enacted a law prohibiting the transmission in interstate commerce of all lottery tickets, and the Supreme Court upheld the validity of such law. The court says:

"We are of the opinion that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic and, therefore, are subjects of commerce, and the regulation of the carriage of such tickets, from State to State, at least by independent carriers, is a regulation of commerce among the several States.

"But it is said that the statute in question does not 'regulate' the carrying of lottery tickets from State to State, but by punishing those who cause them to be so carried Congress, in effect, prohibits such carrying.

"It is said in effect (by Congress) that it would not permit the declared policy of the States which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce. Congress alone has the power to occupy by legislation the whole field of interstate commerce. What was said by this court on a former occasion may well be here repeated.

"The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of the subject matter specifically committed to its charge. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545.)

"That regulation may sometimes appropriately assume the form of prohibition is also illustrated by the case of diseased cattle transported from one State to another. Such cattle may have, notwithstanding their condition, a value in money for some purposes, and yet it can not be doubted that Congress, under its power to regulate commerce, may either provide for their being inspected before transportation begins or, in its discretion, may prohibit their being transported from one State to another."

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, says that Congress has the same power to regulate interstate as foreign commerce. He says:

"If this be the admitted meaning of the word in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence and remain a unit, unless there be some plain, intelligible cause which alters it."

In the case of Cruthers v. Kentucky (141 U. S., 58) the court uses this language:

"It has frequently been laid down by this court that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is as absolute as it is over foreign commerce. And the same thing is exactly true with regard to interstate commerce as it is with regard to foreign commerce. No difference is perceivable between the two."

In Brown v. Houston (114 U. S., 630), the court says:

"The power to regulate commerce among the several States is granted to Congress in terms as absolute as is the power to regulate the commerce with foreign nations."

In Buttfield's case (192 U. S., 470) the court held that Congress, under the commerce power, could prohibit importation of articles from foreign countries. Of course this is well-settled law.

In Stockton v. Baltimore (32 Fed Rep., 9) Judge Bradley, who later became a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

"We think the power of Congress is supreme over the whole subject, unhampered and unembarrassed by State lines or State laws. That in this matter the country is one and the work to be accomplished is national, and that State interests, State jealousies, and State prejudices do not require to be consulted. In matters of foreign and interstate commerce there are no States."

Congress has power to prohibit the transportation of all intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce. The cases cited above abundantly establish this contention.

Hon. John W. Yerkes, representing several large distilleries, spoke before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on January 25, 1908, in opposition to the then pending bill, and in the course of his argument said that in his opinion Congress had this power. At the same hearing and on the same day Senator Knox, a member of the committee, made this statement:

"Mr. Crane, who appeared here for the brewing company, said he thought Congress had that power. He thought it could absolutely prohibit the transportation of any such intoxicating liquors."

If Congress can arbitrarily prohibit the interstate transportation of all intoxicating liquors, then most certainly can Congress prohibit the shipment of any less portion of liquor or of any kind or class of liquor for whatever reason it chooses to assign or without giving any reason whatever. The larger power necessarily includes the smaller. This bill does not undertake, however, to prohibit the shipment of all liquor in interstate commerce, but only that which is intended to be used in violating a law of a sovereign State.

Congress has the power to refer to the orderly tribunals of the States the right and power to ascertain whether or not the liquor is intended to be used in violation of the State law, and if such tribunal, which might be considered the agent of Congress, finds that the liquor is intended to be used in violating the laws of the State, then eo instanti such liquor, although in commerce, is taken out of the legitimate sphere of interstate commerce and ceases to be a legitimate article of interstate commerce, and in law never was a lawful article of commerce.

Referring to an agent the power or duty of ascertaining some fact before a law shall take effect is neither novel nor unusual in the legislative history of our country. In many States the local-option laws do not take effect until the people in certain specified districts vote "wet" or "dry," as the case may be.

Only last summer Congress passed a law providing that when the President should find that a state of war existed in any American country and issued his proclamation to this effect then it should be unlawful to ship arms from the United States to such country. This law was intended to apply to the Mexican situation. The law was drawn by Senator ROOT, and its constitutionality so far has not been attacked. Why can not Congress refer to the orderly tribunals of the sovereign States the power to determine whether a shipment of liquor is intended to be used in violation of the laws of such States and after the fact is determined immediately the law become effective as to such shipment? The statute books carry many laws placing it in the power of the President and the various heads of the departments to ascertain certain facts before such laws may take effect.

The intent with which a thing is done is ofttimes the principal element in the crime.

Section 249, Criminal Code of the United States, makes anyone guilty of a crime who builds or fits out a vessel or sends it away for the purpose of procuring any person from any foreign country to be transported to any place to be sold, etc.

Section 255 of the Criminal Code of the United States provides that whoever builds or fits out a ship, intending that the same shall be employed in slave trade, shall forfeit the vessel and pay a fine of $2,000. Under this section the vessel shall be forfeited, if the builder intends to use it in the slave trade, whether such vessel ever engaged in slave trade or not.

Section 271 makes it a crime to bring a person into the United States with the intent to hold such person in confinement. There are many other sections of the Criminal Code in which intent is the chief element of crime.

If this bill should become a law, the State courts would therefore ascertain the fact of intent as they ascertain any other fact involving the question of intent.

No attempt in this bill is made to reach abstract intent, but only that intent which is "connected with the overt act of making or receiving any interstate shipment of liquor accompanied by the intent. Certainly there is nothing new about penal stautes which prohibit some specific act provided it be coupled with some specified intent. By way of illustration, forgery and obtaining by false pretenses are not, in themselves, made punishable. Whether they be so depends upon whether the act is done with intent to defraud."

Harmonizing congressional enactments with State laws is not unusual. The act of May 25, 1900, as contained in section 242 of the Criminal Code, makes it a crime to transport dead birds or wild animals in interstate commerce when such birds have been killed or shipped in violation of the laws of the State or district in which the same were killed or from which the same were shipped.

Congress passed a law while Jefferson was President forbidding the importation of free negroes from one State into any other State where they were not permitted by the laws of such State to reside.

Section 229 of the United States Criminal Code adopts the laws of the States for furnishing certain wrongful acts committed upon any lands reserved for the exclusive use of the United States or purchased by consent of the legislature, etc.

The act of August 19, 1911, providing for publicity of campaign contributions conforms to the laws of the various States in these words:

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election, any sum in the aggregate in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides."

It will be seen that it is not necessary for a congressional act to be uniform throughout the United States, unless it is a law levying duties, imposts, and excises.

The pure-food law allows the export of any article when no substance is used in its preparation in conflict with the laws of a foreign country to which said article is intended to be shipped. The same law provides that condemned goods shall not be sold contrary to the laws of the State in which the sale is made. Congress has adopted the States as agents for supplying the procedure in the various Federal courts.

Congress has conformed its bankruptcy laws to the various State laws in the matter of exemptions, dower, priority of payments, etc. Delegating this power, or making the laws correspond to the State laws, does not invalidate the bankruptcy act, although Congress has the power of establishing "uniform laws" on the subject of bankruptcy, but uniformity is not required under the commerce clause.

Congress has enacted a law making the competency of a witness to testify in the United States courts depend upon the laws of the State in which the court is held.

Congress has left, by legal enactment, the qualifications and exemptions of jurors to State laws, and Colorado has recently qualified women as jurors.

Mr. CLAYTON. My request is that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman——

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this will not come out of my time. I will have to withdraw my request if it is going to be objected to.

Mr. LANGLEY. I wanted to ask the Chairman whether under that form of request anyone who was recognized by the Chair for the purpose of asking the privilege of extending his remarks would be excluded?

Mr. CLAYTON. It would not exclude him.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding further, I want to ask those who favor this class of legislation to join us in opposing the amendments which have been offered to this bill. It may seem strange to some Members when I ask you to oppose the penalty-clause amendment, for instance, offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS]. The advocates of this bill have always taken the position that prohibition laws are local laws enacted by the States, and therefore the States ought to execute their own police regulations, and that they ought not to call on the Congress of the United States to execute such laws for them. Therefore, if you adopt this penal provision, you ask the Congress of the United States to execute the local State laws by criminal proceedings. I believe in the right of the States to control absolutely the entire liquor question. The Supreme Court has decided over and over again that it is solely within the police power of a State to forbid, license, and control the manufacture, sale, or other disposition of spirituous and intoxicating liquors within its borders. Therefore we feel that we should not ask Congress to do something that the States ought to do, to wit, enforce their prohibition laws. What we do ask is that Congress, through its power over interstate commerce, shall remove the restrictions which now bind the action of the States in their efforts to honestly enforce their lawful prohibition enactments. That, gentlemen, is in brief why we feel that we should oppose this criminal or penal clause which has been offered here as an amendment.

Most certainly we oppose the personal-use clause offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] and by Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I hope no Democrat and no Republican Member will affront his State by voting for such a proposition. If the States have the right, in the first place, to prohibit the personal use or receipt of liquor, this Congress has no power to take that right away from the States. On the other hand, if the State has no power under its own constitution or the Constitution of the United States to deprive a man of the right of the personal use of liquor, then this law is harmless as to such right, because the State can never take that right from him.

I can conceive of a great injustice that you may do your own State, wet States as well as dry, if you undertake to force upon the States this personal-use amendment. If you adopt it, then the State will be powerless to prohibit what every State now prohibits, viz, the reception of liquor by a minor under the age of 16 years. The State would be powerless to prevent the delivery of liquor to a man who has been convicted of a violation of her laws in selling liquor. A State would be powerless to prevent the delivery of liquor to a habitual drunkard or an inebriate, and every State in this Union where the liquor traffic is licensed even has laws prohibiting a barkeeper from selling to that class of people. But now you propose to enact into a law of the United States a provision which will compel the States to allow that very class of people to receive the liquor, although their own citizens are not permitted to sell it to such persons, and the States will be compelled to allow it to go into the hands of these prohibited classes. A saloon keeper in Boston is forbidden by State law to sell liquor to a minor or to a habitual drunkard, but if you adopt this amendment, then a saloon keeper in another State will have the right to sell to this class of persons and have the liquor delivered to them in Boston, which is giving the outside saloon keeper a right which is denied the local dealer.

Senator Knox, who has given this class of legislation a great deal of study, filed a very learned report on the bills then pending before the Senate in 1909, and on the question of whether or not Congress should insert in such legislation the personal-use clause says:

"Congressional expression in favor of personal use would be an expression upon a subject with which Congress has nothing to do, and upon it all sorts of confusing questions would arise."

I realize that many would like to have this Congress pass a law prohibiting the shipment of all liquor into dry territory. No State has gone that far, and I do not want Congress to go further than the States have gone. I do not want Congress to make Kentucky dry, and I do not want Congress to make North Carolina wet, but I do want what this bill provides—that the State of Kentucky be allowed to control the whole matter as she deems best and allow my State to do the same thing. This bill will do that.

Strictly speaking, this law is not a prohibition law. It is a local-option measure to give to the States what they have always been entitled to under our interpretation of the Constitution—the right to control this troublesome question for themselves.

I take it that no States at present will absolutely prohibit the individual legitimate personal use of whisky. If they do and it is constitutional for them to do so, why should Congress attempt to take this constitutional right away from them by this amendment? Leave it to the State, and to the State alone, as the Supreme Court has often said, to settle these questions in their own way and work out their own salvation. Therefore, I shall ask the friends of this class of legislation to vote down these amendments, because they will load down the bill and make its passage that much more difficult and uncertain, which is the desire of the opponents of the pending measure.

Now, gentlemen, just a moment on the policy of this measure. Some gentlemen have said, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] intimated, that the States now, under the present situation and condition of the law, have all the power they need to execute their prohibition laws. I take issue with my friend. I declare to him that the statement is not correct, and if I can not show him that it is not correct I shall not ask him to vote for the bill.

In the decision of Leisy v. Hardin (125 U. S.), it was declared that a man had not only the right to import liquor, but also to sell it in the original package, in spite of any State law forbidding such sale. People everywhere grew restive under that sort of decision. I can not understand the reasoning of the court in that case. There were dissenting opinions, but it was declared the law that a man had the right to import liquor and to sell it in the original package in violation of the laws of the State.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is, in the original package.

Mr. WEBB. In the original package, I so stated. That shocks the average man, whether he is a State rights Democrat or a State rights Republican, or the contrary. No man outside of my State ought to have a superior right to the citizen within my State. There is no guarantee in the Constitution that gives the outsider a personal right to sell liquor in my State or ship it into my State if my State prohibits such sale in the State. The Supreme Court has said that often. If a man has not a right in my State to sell liquor, then certainly a citizen living in the District of Columbia ought not to have a superior right to enable him to sell it inside my State.

After that opinion was rendered public sentiment grew in favor of enacting a law which would remedy it. Senator Wilson, of Iowa, was the father of the Wilson law which was passed in 1890 and aimed to meet this decision. It provided—I am not quoting the law but only the substance of it—that whenever intoxicating liquors should arrive within a State they should immediately become subject to the police laws of that State. Now, the object of the men who passed the bill in 1890 was to put all intoxicating liquors, immediately upon arrival of the liquors within the borders of a sovereign State, under the control of the police laws of that State. No man who reads the bill and the debates that occurred at that time will deny it.

When that law came before the Supreme Court in 1897, in the case of Rhodes against Iowa, the court said the law is constitutional, but Congress did not mean to say that you could seize the liquor before it reached the consignee; it meant by the words "arrival in the State" delivery to the consignee, and therefore you can not touch the liquor until it is delivered to the consignee, although it does take away the right of the consignee to sell it in the original package in violation of State laws.

Ever since that decision any individual has had a right to have liquor shipped to him and delivered to him, and not until it is actually delivered to him does it become subject to the laws of the State. So the right to the delivery of the liquor to the consignee is still sacred under the commerce clause of the Constitution under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Rhodes against Iowa.

Now, what the people of the United States, or a large portion, representing 2,000,000 square miles of territory, want is to give the States, if they can, the power to seize the liquors, which are intended to be used in violation of their laws, before the liquors get into the hands of the consignee—into the hands of blind tigers, bootleggers, speak-easies, and other law violators.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEBB. If it is brief; my time is short.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not trying to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, certainly not; I realize that. The gentleman may ask a question, but let it be brief.

Mr. SHERLEY. Under this law, assuming its constitutionality, would it not be possible for them to seize every shipment that came into a State, and then would not the consignee have to prove that he did not intend to violate the law?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely not. If my friend has thus understood this bill, I am surprised, for the burden of proving unlawful intent is upon the man who alleges it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; a brief question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would it not be within their power to seize it and then undertake to prove the intent?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; but in further answer to that I can say it is within the power of any man in this city to cause the arrest of the gentleman from Kentucky as he goes from this Hall to his home to-night upon a charge of murder or other crime. Any law can be abused. The liquor law can be abused as well as any other law, but we have no right to assume that it will be abused. The gentleman may be arrested at any time for some offense that he never thought of. The man who arrests a consignment of liquor under this bill must prove that it is intended to be used in violation of the law of the State, and he has to prove it in an orderly tribunal, and after it is proven, then, eo instanti, the liquor is taken out of interstate commerce and becomes subject to the laws of the State, because in law it never was legitimate interstate commerce.

Mr. SHERLEY. It practically means that when the authorities desire it, you have to have a lawsuit to get an interstate shipment. I just want the House to understand the scope of the bill.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that is a fact, but that is true of every other thing that is litigated in life. If I want a lawsuit, I can get it out of the gentleman in 25 minutes. I can sue the gentleman on a note that he never made. I can have him arrested upon a charge of which he is not guilty, but men do not enjoy this kind of litigation, for costs and damage follow.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. And every other law on the statute book is subject to the same objection.

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. McCOY. Is it not a fact that in some States the mere possession of a certain quantity of liquor raises a presumption that the person who has it in his possession intends to violate the law?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that is with reference to the State law.

Mr. McCOY. Then, in those cases, for the quantity mentioned, coming into the State in interstate commerce, could it not be seized, and would the burden not be on the consignee to prove or at least proceed with the evidence to show that he was not intending to violate the law?

Mr. WEBB. No. The man who alleges violation of the statute has to prove it.

Mr. McCOY. But prima facie the possession proves it, does it not?

Mr. WEBB. No; certainly not. You could not well prove an intent to have an intent.

Mr. McCOY. Under some of the laws?

Mr. WEBB. To give you a practical illustration of the working of this bill I set it out in the report of the committee. A few months ago in an adjoining State there were three or four barrels of liquor delivered to an express office in a certain town. One of the barrels contained 500 half-pint bottles of liquor, another contained 400 half-pint bottles, and another contained 140 quart bottles of liquor. Two of those consignments went to men of doubtful character, and one to a colored man, who had been convicted in that jurisdiction of "blind tigering," if I may use the term. That liquor sat in the express office, within the jurisdiction of the State, on her soil, for weeks, and it may be for months, and although every civil officer of that town was morally satisfied that that liquor was intended to be used to violate the laws of the State, they were powerless to touch the liquor until after it was actually delivered into the hands of the man who intended to violate the law with it.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is a hiatus between the arrival of such liquor in the express office and the delivery to the consignee over which the State ought to have control. It would be a horrible thought that a man could start a shipment of nitroglycerine to the capital of a State, with the avowed intention of blowing up the capital as soon as he got possession of the explosive, and that there was no power in the State to arrest or seize that nitroglycerine after it landed within the State and before it was delivered to the dynamiter.

Now, who can oppose this sort of a proposition? What is the objection to it? Is there anybody here who wants to stand up and say he favors violating the laws of any State of the Union? I am not in favor of violating the laws of Kentucky, New Hampshire, or any other State, and I hope there is no man among you who wants to aid or abet the violation of the laws of my State.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit me another question?

Mr. WEBB. I have only 10 minutes—if the gentleman will make it brief.

Mr. SHERLEY. Am I to understand the gentleman will favor a law prohibiting the shipment of any article of commerce that was in violation——

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; I know that a certain class of men in the United States have been trying hard ever since this Government has gradually been outlawing liquor, to make liquor as respectable as other articles of commerce, but it can not be done. This Congress has driven it out of the Capitol of the Nation; this Congress has driven it out of the mails of the United States; this Congress has made a man incapable of holding a civil-service job who is addicted to drinking the stuff; this Congress has gradually outlawed it, and there is no living man but knows that intoxicating liquors in this country ought not to have the same standing as other articles of interstate commerce. They stand in a condemned class by themselves. The Supreme Court of the United States in many great decisions have declared it a source of crime and sorrow throughout the United States, and I know that this Congress of the United States ought not to put liquor in the same class with other respectable articles of commerce. I for one will not do that.

Mr. Speaker, the courts of the United States, both State and Federal, have taken judicial notice of the evils of liquor. Mr. Justice Field, of the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Crowley v. Christensen (137 U. S., 90-91), says:

"It is urged that as the liquors are used as a beverage, and the injury following them, if taken in excess, is voluntarily inflicted and is confined to the party offending, their sale should be without restrictions, the contention being that what a man shall drink, equally with what he shall eat, is not properly matter for legislation.

"There is in this position an assumption of a fact which does not exist, that when the liquors are taken in excess the injuries are confined to the party offending. The injury, it is true, first falls upon him in his health, which the habit undermines; in his morals, which it weakens; and in the self-abasement which it creates. But, as it leads to neglect of business and waste of property and general demoralization, it affects those who are immediately connected with and dependent upon him. By the general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community, there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dramshop, where intoxicating liquors in small quantities, to be drunk at the time, are sold indiscriminately to all parties applying. The statistics of every State show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source. There is no inherent right in a citizen to thus sell intoxicating liquors by retail; it is not a privilege of a citizen of the State or of a citizen of the United States. As it is a business attended with danger to the community, it may, as already said, be entirely prohibited, or be permitted under such conditions as will limit to the utmost its evils."

And again, Mr. Speaker, in the great case of Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S.), Judge Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, among other things, says:

"We can not shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public health, the public morals, and the public safety may be endangered by the general use of intoxicating drinks, nor the fact, established by statistics accessible to everyone, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime existing in the country are in some degree at least traceable to this evil."

Mr. SHERLEY. I thought the gentleman was arguing on the point of violating the State law; and, if that was true, no matter what the article was, you did not want to violate the State law.

Mr. WEBB. I am perfectly willing to put liquor and cigarettes in the same class.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the gentleman willing to prevent the violation of any State law, or does the gentleman's State virtue only go to certain laws?

Mr. WEBB. My State law does not prohibit the interstate shipment of many things——

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not touch this.

Mr. WEBB. I want public sentiment to gradually develop before Congress takes hold of all these questions. Take the question of lotteries. The time may come when——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not want his virtue to run ahead of public opinion?

Mr. WEBB. I do not, if you want to put it that way; public opinion often makes virtue, and it is often a virtue to abide by such opinion. You can execute no law successfully except public opinion be back of it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. Yes, briefly.

Mr. MANN. Ought not we also to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of diseased or tuberculous milk, which kills more infants than liquor kills adults?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I will support such a law.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman will vote for my amendment, which will improve this law?

Mr. WEBB. It is not germane to this bill, and will not help the passage of it. If the gentleman will bring it out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I will vote for it.

Mr. MANN. This amendment that I have offered is to strike out the word "intoxicating," so as to make the bill apply to milk and save the infants.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, one word as to the constitutionality of the bill. I have tried very briefly, and I know imperfectly, to discuss the policy of the bill. I do not think there is a doubt in the mind of any lawyer in this House that the Congress of the United States, through the power lodged in it by Article I, section 8, clause 3, of the Constitution, has the right to exclude all liquors from interstate commerce, just as we have excluded lottery tickets from interstate commerce. When the States joined themselves together they gave up all their sovereign rights to deal with commerce going on between the several States and transmitted that power to the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause, and now Congress has the absolute sovereign power to control all the commerce between all the States, all the foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes.

The Supreme Court has often held that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to exclude articles from commerce. They have also held that the power of controlling commerce with foreign nations is the same as controlling commerce among the States and with the Indian tribes. They have held that you can exclude many things from interstate commerce, even to the prohibition of a lottery ticket, and the power is supreme in our hands under the first article of the Constitution. Therefore, if we choose so to do, we can exclude all liquor from interstate commerce; but this bill does not do that.

It will not be amiss to cite a few Supreme Court decisions along this line. I call attention first to the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 189), in which the great Chief Justice Marshall, in discussing the question of the power of Congress over commerce with reference to the embargo act, said:

"They (people who are opposed to the passage of such laws) deny that the particular law in question was made in pursuance of the Constitution, not because the power could not act directly on vessels, but because a partial embargo was the annihilation and not the regulation of commerce."

The Chief Justice, in answering this argument, said:

"It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single Government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as found in the Constitution of the United States."

And again, in the case of United States v. Marigold (9 How., 560), Justice Daniel made it clear that the power to regulate included the power to prohibit, in this language:

"Congress by the Constitution is vested with the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; and, however at periods of high excitement an application of the terms to 'regulate commerce,' such as would embrace absolute prohibition, may have been questioned, yet since the passage of the embargo and nonintercourse laws and the repeated judicial sanctions those statutes have received it can scarcely at this day be open to doubt that every subject falling within the legitimate sphere of commercial regulation may be partially or wholly excluded when either measure shall be demanded by the safety or by the important interests of the entire Nation. Such exclusion can not be limited to particular classes or descriptions of commercial subjects; it may embrace manufactures, bullion, coin, or any other thing. The power once conceded, it may operate on any and every subject of commerce to which the legislative discretion may apply it."

The foregoing cases apply to foreign commerce. Let us see how it is applied to the Indian tribes, which power is given in the same clause as that among the States and foreign nations.

In the case of the United States v. 43 Gallons of Whisky (93 U. S., 188) the court construed a statute prohibiting the shipment of liquor into the county of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, which county was not within the Indian reservation. It had no more to do with the Indians than the District of Columbia, and the court, upholding the constitutionality of this statute, said:

"Congress, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce among the Indian tribes, may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, but extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by Indians. Under the Articles of Confederation the United States had the power of regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians not members of any of the States, provided that the legislative rights of a State within its own limits be not infringed or violated. Of necessity these limitations rendered the power of no practical value. This was seen by the convention which framed the Constitution, and Congress now has the exclusive and absolute power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes—a power as broad and as free from restrictions as that to regulate commerce with foreign nations." "In view of this changed condition," says Judge Davis in this opinion, "it would be strange indeed if the commercial power lodged solely with Congress and unrestricted, as it is, by State lines did not extend to the exclusion of spirituous liquors intended to corrupt the Indians not only from existing Indian country but from that which has ceased to be so by reason of its cession to the United States."

In the Rahrer case Chief Justice Fuller used this language:

"By the adoption of the Constitution the ability of the several States to act upon the matter solely in accordance with their own will was extinguished and the legislative will of the General Government substituted. No affirmative guaranty was hereby given to any State of the right to demand as between it and the others what it could not have obtained before, while the object was undoubtedly sought to be attained by preventing commercial regulations partial in their character or contrary to their common interests. And the magnificent growth and prosperity of the country attest the success which has attended the accomplishment of that object. But this furnishes no support to the position that Congress could not in the exercise of the discretion reposed in it, concluding that the common interests did not require entire freedom in the traffic in ardent spirits, enact the law in question."

In 1808 the case of the United States against William was decided, involving the embargo laws, and the law was sustained not under the taxing power but entirely under the commerce clause. The court in this case says:

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. Such is the declaration in the Constitution. Stress has been laid in the argument on the word 'regulate' as implying in itself a limitation. Power to regulate, it is said, can not be understood to give a power to annihilate. To this may be replied that the acts under consideration, though of very ample extent, do not operate as a prohibition of all foreign commerce. It will be admitted that partial prohibitions are authorized by the expression, and how shall the degree or extent of the prohibition be adjusted but by the discretion of the National Government, to whom the subject appears to be committed? Let this be admitted, and are they not at liberty also to consider the present prohibition as necessary and proper to an eventual beneficial regulation? I say nothing of the policy of the expedient. It is not within my province, but in the abstract question of the constitutional power I see nothing to prohibit or restrain the measure. It was perceived that, under the power of regulating commerce, Congress would be authorized to abridge it in favor of the great principles of humanity and justice. It has been said in the argument that the large commercial States, such as New York and Massachusetts, would never have consented to the grant of power relative to commerce if supposed capable of the extent now claimed. On this point it is believed there was no misunderstanding. The necessity of a competent National Government was manifest. Its essential characteristics were considered and were understood, and all intelligent men perceived that a power to advance and protect the national interests necessarily involved a power that might be abused."

In the Addyston Pipe Co. case (175 U. S.), involving the antitrust law, the court said:

"The reasons which may have caused the framers of the Constitution to repose the power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress do not, however, affect or limit the extent of the power itself. In Gibbon against Ogden the power was declared to be complete within itself and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution."

We now come to the Lottery case which decided the point completely. The Congress in 1895 enacted a law prohibiting the transmission in interstate commerce of all lottery tickets, and the constitutionality of the law was bitterly and powerfully attacked. In this decision these tickets were declared to be commerce, otherwise Congress could not act upon them.

Here is what the court says on this point:

"We are of the opinion that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic and therefore are subjects of commerce, and the regulation of carriage of such tickets from State to State, at least by independent carriers, is a regulation of commerce among the several States.

"But it is said that the statute in question does not 'regulate' the carrying of lottery tickets from State to State, but by punishing those who cause them to be so carried Congress, in effect, prohibits such carrying. That in respect to the carrying from one State to another of articles or other things that are, in fact or according to usage in business, the subjects of commerce.

"It is said, in effect, by Congress that it would not permit the declared policy of the States, which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business, to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce. Congress alone has the power to occupy by legislation the whole field of interstate commerce. What was said by this court on a former occasion may well be here repeated.

"'The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of the subject matter specifically committed to its charge.' (In re Rahrer case, 140 U. S., 545.)

"That regulation may sometimes appropriately assume the form of prohibition is also illustrated by the case of diseased cattle transported from one State to another. Such cattle may have, notwithstanding their condition, a value in money for some purposes, and yet it can not be doubted that Congress, under its power to regulate commerce, may either provide for their being inspected before transportation begins, or, in its discretion, may prohibit their being transported from one State to another.

"The act of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Antitrust Act, and which is based on the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, is an illustration of the proposition that regulation may take the form of prohibition. That regulation may sometimes take the form or have the effect of prohibition is also illustrated in the case of re Rahrer.

"We decide that, under its power to regulate commerce among the several States, Congress, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of the power granted, has plenary authority over such commerce and may prohibit the carriage of such tickets from State to State."

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbon v. Ogden, says that the Congress has the same power to regulate interstate as foreign commerce. Here is his language:

"If this be the admitted meaning of the word in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence and remain a unit, unless there be some plain, intelligible cause which alters it."

In the case of Cruthers v. Kentucky (141 U. S., 57 and 58), the Supreme Court used the following language:

"It has frequently been laid down by this court that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is as absolute as it is over foreign commerce. And the same thing is exactly true with regard to interstate commerce as it is with regard to foreign commerce. No difference is perceivable between the two."

"The power to regulate commerce among the several States is granted to Congress in terms as absolute as is the power to regulate the commerce with foreign nations." (Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S., 622.)

In Stockton v. Baltimore (32 Fed. Rep., 9) in 1887, Judge Bradley, who later became a Supreme Court judge, said:

"We think that the power of Congress is supreme over the whole subject, unimpeded and unembarrassed by State lines or State laws. That in this matter the country is one, and the work to be accomplished is national, and that State interests, State jealousies, and State prejudices do not require to be consulted. In matters of foreign and interstate commerce there are no States."

If Congress can arbitrarily prohibit the interstate transportation of all intoxicating liquors, then most certainly can Congress prohibit the shipment of any less portion of liquor or of any kind or class of liquor for whatever reason it chooses to assign or without giving any reason whatever. The larger power necessarily includes the smaller. This bill does not undertake, however, to prohibit the shipment of all liquor in interstate commerce, but only that which is intended to be used in violating a law of a sovereign State.

Congress has often exercised its power over commerce by absolutely excluding certain articles from commerce altogether.

The act of March 2, 1895, prohibits any ship to clear which has on board fresh, salted, canned, or packed beef, unless the owner of the ship shall have from an inspector a certificate that said cattle are free from disease, and so forth.

The act of May 30, 1908, prohibits the transportation of nitroglycerine on any vessel or vehicle of any description operated by a common carrier in the transportation of passengers or articles of commerce by land or water.

The act of March 31, 1900, prohibits the transportation of explosive materials in any vessel or vehicle in interstate commerce.

The Congress many years ago passed the embargo laws. The Congress prohibited the importation of slaves. The Congress has prohibited the importation of counterfeit coins. The Congress prohibited importation of all convict-made goods.

The act of July, 1902, prohibits the introduction or sale of food products falsely labeled or branded.

The act of February 21, 1905, prohibits the transportation of gold or silver goods bearing the words "United States assay" or any similar words, or falsely branded.

The act of March 3, 1905, prohibits the transportation of loose hay or other highly inflammable materials on passenger steamers.

The act of February 21, 1905, prohibits the transportation of obscene books, notwithstanding that the Constitution guarantees freedom of speech, and it has been held that printing is as much speech as spoken words.

The act of March 3, 1905, prohibits the transportation of quarantined cattle. The act of March 3, 1905, prohibits the transportation of certain insects, including the boll weevil. If we can prohibit the transportation of insects, the transportation of convict-made goods, the transportation of gold and silver because it has three words stamped on it, the transportation of cattle whether diseased or healthy, then with how much more force can we argue that the Government has the right to prohibit the transportation of liquor which is intended to be sold in violation of the law of the sovereign State.

The act of June 25, 1910, prohibits the transportation or assistance in transportation of any woman or girl for the purpose of debauchery or for other immoral purposes or with intent, and so forth.

The act of June 29, 1906, prohibits any interstate carrier from giving any free ticket, pass, or transportation to certain persons and permits free transportation to certain other persons.

The act of May 25, 1900, makes it unlawful for any person to transport certain foreign animals or birds the importation of which is prohibited, and prohibits the transportation of dead bodies or parts thereof of any wild animals or birds where such animals or birds have been killed in violation of the laws of the State in which the same were killed, and provides that the transportation of dead birds, and so forth, may be had during the season when the same may be lawfully captured, and the export of which is not prohibited by law in the State in which the same were killed.

The act of May 23, 1887: Importation of opium by Chinamen prohibited, and such shall be forfeited, and no citizen of the United States shall transport opium to open ports of China.

The act of March 4, 1909, prohibits selling or transporting to any native of the Pacific Isles any liquor or opium. (Sec. 308.)

Congress has taken out of the sphere of legitimate commerce colored oleomargarine, misbranded liquors, C. O. D. shipments of liquors, and certain property owned by common carriers.

Unlawful to hunt, trap, kill, and so forth, any birds or animals or take eggs on any lands set apart or reserved as breeding grounds for birds, by any law, proclamation, or Executive order, except under rules from time to time prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture—fine or imprisonment for violating provision of act. (June 28, 1906, 34 Stat. L., pp. 536, 538.)

Oleomargarine subject to State laws. (May 9, 1902, 32 Stat. L., p. 193.)

President authorized to designate such areas in Wichita Forest Reserve as in his opinion should be set aside for breeding places for birds, animals, and so forth, and then trapping, hunting, and so forth, in such places are unlawful, except under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time prescribe. One thousand dollars fine or one year's imprisonment. (Jan. 24, 1905, 33 Stat. L., p. 614.)

Can not ship gypsy moth, and so forth, into States, and Secretary of Agriculture makes rules for shipping for scientific purposes and States give authority to further prohibit. (Mar. 3, 1905, 33 U. S. Stat. L., p. 1269.)

Rights of way for construction of dams, reservoirs, tunnels, flumes, and so forth, across and within United States forest reserves granted to citizens, and so forth, under such rules as the Secretary of Agriculture may make and subject to the laws of Territories and States in which reserves are situated. (Feb. 1, 1905, 33 U. S. Stat. L., p. 628.)

Any person violating act or any rules and regulations in pursuance thereof made by the Secretary of Interior guilty of misdemeanor and fines not over $500 or imprisonment not over six months. (Act June 3, 1878, 20 U. S. Stat. L., p. 89.)

Whoever violates or permits violation of any rule, regulation, or order made pursuant to foregoing act, such vessel may be prohibited from again carrying cattle from any port of the United States for such length of time, not exceeding one year, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct. (Act Mar. 3, 1891, 26 Stat. L., p. 833.)

Anyone who forges or counterfeits, and so forth, or uses without authority any marks, stamps, or devices provided for in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, guilty of misdemeanor, $1,000 fine or imprisonment not exceeding one year. (Mar. 2, 1895, 28 Stat. L., p. 732.)

Anyone violating rules and regulations which Secretary of Interior may make to preserve forests, and so forth, guilty of misdemeanor, and so forth. (Act June 4, 1897, 30 Stat. L., p. 35.)

Secretary of Agriculture prescribes rules for killing game in Alaska, and violations a misdemeanor. (Act June 7, 1902, 32 Stat. L., p. 327.)

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEBB. I have not the time to yield. I want to be courteous, but I have not the time.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for just a short question?

Mr. WEBB. I have but 10 minutes, and I am laboring under difficulty in making this argument in that time. My position is, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that if Congress has such power to prohibit arbitrarily the shipment of whisky in interstate commerce, that it has the power to prohibit the shipment of any lesser quantity or lesser portion for whatever reason it pleases, or to assign no reason at all. If a man has the right to cut down an entire tree, he has the right to remove a few limbs. This law prohibits the liquor being shipped in interstate commerce, if it is intended to be used in violation of the law of the State into which it is shipped. If liquor should be shipped for that purpose and it should be seized, and the fact established by proper proof, if this bill becomes a law, then that kind of liquor is taken out of the legitimate sphere of commerce, and in contemplation of law never was lawful commerce, and becomes subject to the law of the State, because the laws of commerce protect it no further if it is determined that it is to be used to violate the laws of a sovereign State.

The State courts may determine whether such liquor is intended to be used in violation of the law of such State, and if the question is answered "Yes" by the jury, then automatically this proposed law takes effect, and such liquor is eo instanti taken out of the realm of legitimate commerce. Surely Congress, which has plenary power over this whole subject of commerce, can leave to the orderly tribunals of the various States the right to determine whether or not the liquor is intended to be used in violation of their law.

The delegation of the duty or power to an individual of finding some fact before a congressional act takes effect is neither new nor novel. We have often enacted such laws. Only last summer Congress passed a law providing that when the President should find that a state of war existed in any American country and issued his proclamation to this effect, then it should be unlawful to ship arms from the United States to such country. This law was intended to apply to the Mexican situation. The law was drawn by Senator Root, and its constitutionality so far has not been attacked. Why can not Congress refer to the orderly tribunals of the sovereign States the power to determine whether a shipment of liquor is intended to be used in violation of the laws of such States, and after the fact is determined immediately the law becomes effective as to such shipment? The statute books carry many laws placing it in the power of the President and the various heads of the departments to ascertain certain facts before such laws may take effect. The finding of the fact by the President does not destroy the congressional power, but the act only depends upon his finding to take effect. He only acts as an agent to ascertain a fact before the act takes effect.

Harmonizing congressional enactments with State laws is not unusual. The act of May 25, 1900, as contained in section 242 of the Criminal Code, makes it a crime to transport dead birds or wild animals in interstate commerce when such birds have been shipped or killed in violation of the laws of the State or district in which the same were killed or from which the same were shipped.

Congress passed a law while Jefferson was President forbidding the importation of free negroes from one State into any other State where they were not permitted by the laws of such State to reside.

Section 229 of the United States Criminal Code adopts the laws of the States for punishing certain wrongful acts committed upon any lands reserved for the exclusive use of the United States or purchased by consent of the legislatures, and so forth.

The act of August 19, 1911, providing for publicity of campaign contributions conforms to the laws of the various States in these words:

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination or election, any sum in the aggregate in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides."

It will be seen that it is not necessary for a congressional act to be uniform throughout the United States unless it is a law levying duties, imposts, and excises.

The pure-food law allows the export of any article when no substance is used in its preparation in conflict with the laws of a foreign country to which said article is intended to be shipped. The same law provides that condemned goods shall not be sold contrary to the laws of the State in which the sale is made. Congress has adopted the States as agents for supplying the procedure in the various Federal courts.

Congress has conformed its bankruptcy laws to the various State laws in the matter of exemptions, dower, priority of payments, and so forth. Delegating this power or making the laws correspond to the State laws does not invalidate the bankruptcy act, although Congress has the power of establishing "uniform laws" on the subject of bankruptcy, but uniformity is not required under the commerce clause.

Congress has enacted a law making the competency of a witness to testify in the United States courts depend upon the laws of the State in which the court is held.

Congress has left, by legal enactment, the qualifications and exemptions of jurors to State laws, and Colorado has recently qualified women as jurors.

I say that it is nothing new to make our law conform to State laws. We did it in 1900 when we made it a crime for any person or corporation or transportation company to ship birds or the dead bodies of birds out of a State where the birds were killed in violation of the laws of that State. There we made our State laws a criterion for our Federal act, and the violation of those State laws was made a crime against the United States as well as a crime against the State itself.

Some one has said there is difficulty about proving intent. Somebody asked, "How are you going to prove that a man intends to violate the law of his State?" Why, gentlemen, you prove that just as you prove any other offense or crime where intent is the chief ingredient or the chief element. Ninety crimes out of every one hundred denounced by law involve intent. False pretense is not a crime unless you prove intent. Forgery is not a crime unless you prove intent. In a case of this sort the proof of the intent may indeed be difficult, but opponents of this measure can not complain of that. You who oppose this bill need not worry about the difficulty of enforcing it. Let those who advocate it enforce the law, and if difficulty lies in the enforcement of the law, then it will be much to your pleasure, no doubt. The intent with which a thing is done is ofttimes the principal element in the crime.

Section 249 of the Criminal Code of the United States makes anyone guilty of a crime who builds or fits out a vessel or sends it away for the purpose of procuring any person from any foreign country to be transported to any place to be sold, and so forth.

Section 255 of the Criminal Code of the United States provides that whoever builds or fits out a ship, intending that the same shall be employed in slave trade, shall forfeit the vessel and pay a fine of $2,000. Under this section the vessel shall be forfeited if the builder intends to use it in the slave trade, whether such vessel ever engaged in the slave trade or not.

Section 271 makes it a crime to bring a person into the United States with the intent to hold such person in confinement. There are many other sections of the Criminal Code in which intent is the chief element of crime.

If this bill should become a law the State courts would therefore ascertain the fact of intent as they ascertain any other fact involving the question of intent.

No attempt in this bill is made to reach abstract intent but only that intent which is "connected with the overt act of making or receiving any interstate shipment of liquor accompanied by the intent. Certainly there is nothing new about penal statutes which prohibit some specific act, provided it be coupled with some specified intent. By way of illustration, forgery and obtaining by false pretenses are not in themselves made punishable. Whether they be so depends upon whether the act is done with intent to defraud."

If liquor is sent in my State to a "blind tiger" or to a man who is known to be a violator of the laws of the State, and if the liquor is put up in 500 pint bottles, I have the right to assume, knowing the character of the liquor packages and knowing the character of the man to whom it is consigned, that he is going to violate the State laws, and I have a right to prevent it, as I would have the right to prevent the threatened violation of any other law in my State. And when you bring such a person before the court, or when you take the liquor into court—and that is what you would do; the bill only provides for an action in rem; you seize the liquor—you determine whether it was intended to be used or sold in violation of the law. And if the verdict is found against the liquor, the liquor may be confiscated, because it is taken out of interstate commerce and becomes subject to the laws of the States in their sovereign capacity.

Mr. Speaker, this is a just bill. It applies to all States, "wet" and "dry" alike, because every State in the Union has laws against the unrestricted sale of liquor, and this bill would protect the "wet" States whose laws are to be violated in the use or sale of liquor as well as it would protect the "dry" States under the same circumstances. It is a State rights measure. Surely the sovereign States of this Union, which have in their keeping the life, liberty, and property of their citizens, can be fully trusted with the less important power of controlling the liquor traffic in all of its phases. The bill we have before us, which I introduced into this Congress on the 10th of April, 1911, is intended to withdraw the protecting hand of interstate commerce from intoxicating liquors transported into any State or Territory, whether that State be "wet" or "dry," and intended to be used therein in violation of the law of such State or Territory. This bill if enacted into law will permit State officers to seize such liquor under a proper warrant and have the question tried as to whether the liquor is intended to be used in violation of the State law. Who can fairly object to such a provision? This bill might well be styled a local option act to give the various States power to control the liquor traffic as to them might seem best. It would remove the shackles of interstate-commerce law from the action of the States, and discontinue the handicap under which they now labor in enforcing their police regulations, and leave them freer to break up "blind tigers" and "bootleggers" that infest many States, and prevent other uses of liquor in violation of their sovereign laws.

The retail liquor dealers of the United States who are doing business under licenses properly granted by State and local authorities are not fighting this bill. The wholesale liquor dealers, who sell it to retailers who are permitted to do business lawfully, are not opposed to this legislation. The only opponents of the policy of this measure are largely the bootleggers, blind tigers, and speak-easy keepers who operate in prohibition territory, together with that class of brewers, distillers, and wholesale liquor dealers who sell to bootleggers and speak-easy keepers in "dry" territory, who violate the laws of their States and who have little or no regard for the laws of other States, and some who claim it unconstitutional.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands and tens of thousands of the best women and men throughout this broad land who are to-day praying for the passage of this bill. They have no pecuniary interest in the matter. They are actuated by high and noble motives in behalf of mankind. The following will give the House an idea of the widespread sentiment in favor of temperance and prohibition:

No-license area in the United States, 2,120,388 square miles, or 71 per cent.

Population living under no license in the United States, 46,091,098, or 50 per cent plus.

States under prohibition: Georgia, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and West Virginia.

Total population under State-wide prohibition, 14,685,961.

States in which 50 per cent of the population live under no license: Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Nebraska, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Virginia.

Total population of States not under prohibition, but which have at least 50 per cent of the population living under no license, 26,573,611.

States in which 25 per cent or less than 50 per cent of the population is under no license: California, Delaware, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Oregon, Washington, Utah, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

Total population of States in which 25 per cent or less than 50 per cent is under no license, 24,418,784.

The other States have more or less territory where no local-option laws or other provisions for restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes exist.

The following classes of people are begging this Congress for the legislation we are now considering:

The church people, regardless of denomination; the Anti-Saloon League of America; Woman's Christian Temperance Union; International Order of Good Templars; Independent Order of Rechabites; Sons of Temperance; the Templars of Honor and Temperance; National Temperance Society and Publication House; Scientific Temperance Federation; International Reform Bureau; Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; temperance committees of practically every denomination represented in the Federal Council of Churches; National Inter-Church Temperance Federation, and other temperance and reform organizations. These bodies easily represent a constituency of more than 35,000,000. In addition to these forces, all organizations and individuals who are favorable to law enforcement and who stand for law and order are favorable to this legislation.

I have just received the following telegram, which explains itself:

BOSTON, MASS., February 7, 1913.

Hon. E. Y. WEBB,
Washington, D. C.:

At a public meeting held in Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass., on Friday evening, February 7, 1913, the following resolution was passed unanimously:

"Resolved, That the Baptists of Boston and vicinity earnestly request Congress to pass at once the bill entitled 'A bill to prohibit the shipping of liquor from one State into prohibition territory of another'; that we request the Hon. E. Y. WEBB, M. C. the author of said bill, to make known to Congress the wishes of this meeting."

Rev. HERBERT HANDEL, Chairman.

Mr. Speaker, why is it that the cause of prohibition and temperance has grown so rapidly in this country within the last 20 years? One who has seen all around him the wrecks, the destruction of character and manhood caused by the excessive use of liquor can easily answer this question. The American people have become aroused upon this subject as never before, because they have awakened to the fact that liquor is the greatest destroyer of happiness, of the home, and of life that we have among us. People are now ready to agree with Ingersoll when he said:

"I do not believe that anybody can contemplate the object without being prejudiced against the liquor crime. All we have to do is to think of the wrecks on either bank of the stream of death, of the suicides, of the insanity, of the ignorance, of the destitution, of the little children tugging at the faded and withered breasts of the weeping and despairing mothers, of the wives asking for bread, of the men of genius it has wrecked, of men struggling with imaginary serpents, produced by this devilish thing; and when you think of the jails, of the almshouses, of the asylums, of the prisons, of the scaffolds on either bank, I do not wonder that every thoughtful man is prejudiced against this damned stuff called alcohol."

It has been argued by some that strict enforcement of this law will diminish the revenues of the Government. What a sordid argument! Surely patriotic men will not let such argument move them when they know that the decreased consumption of liquor means the increased happiness of mothers and better preservation of the home and the wider conservation of human health and life. In the great opinion in the License cases (46 U. S., 632) it is said:

"If a loss of revenue shall accrue to the United States from the diminished consumption of ardent spirits, she will be the gainer a thousandfold in the health, wealth, and happiness of the people."

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I want to insert an article by Dr. W. S. Rankin, secretary of the North Carolina State Board of Health, on the "Relative importance of different causes of death," which shows the shocking mortality produced by the intemperate use of liquor:

"Until within the last two years one could have stated on the authority of such unbiased students of the liquor problem and such prominent members of the committee of fifty as Dr. John S. Billings and Mr. John Koren, that there was no acceptable estimate of the number of deaths occurring annually in the United States attributable to alcoholic intemperance. Fortunately, we now have the work of Mr. Edward Burnell Phelps, a trained statistician with unprejudiced mind, dealing with the mortality of alcohol. Mr. Phelps's work and estimate will certainly be that accepted by scientific men and unbiased students of this great economic, health, and moral problem as authoritative.

"All estimates of mortality rates must rest upon the authority of the Bureau of the Census of the United States Government. According to our census there are one and a half million deaths every year in the United States. In addition to collecting the reports of these deaths, it is the business of the Bureau of the Census to hold a kind of inquest in the court of public opinion over these dead, by collecting, classifying, tabulating, and publishing, for general information, the principal circumstances connected with their deaths. Such information is most important, as from it the living may learn what are the most important causes of death, and by studying such causes learn how to circumscribe their effects.

"In a general way the comparative importance of the different causes of death may be determined by the relative number of deaths with which each cause is charged. This statement should be qualified, for this general rule will hold only for those causes of death which are closely and directly connected with fatalities; for example, the approximate number of deaths from tuberculosis, typhoid fever, and gunshot wounds gives us a fairly accurate idea of the comparative importance of these causes of death. But our general rule does not hold for those causes of death indirectly and remotely connected with fatalities; for example, malaria, hookworm disease, and alcoholic intemperance are important exceptions to the general rule above stated. The number of deaths set down opposite these and similar causes in the death-rate tables do not represent the complete nor even the major part of their life-destroying power. The greater part of the evil effect of such indirect causes of death is wrought through their destructive action on body defenses, making possible the entrance of other more fatal diseases like those mentioned in the first group, that complete the fatal work which the milder disease instigated.

"Now, to compare the importance of diseases remotely connected with fatalities, such as malaria and alcoholic intemperance, with diseases closely connected with fatalities, it is necessary to reduce the widely distributed effect of the former to its equivalent in total deaths, and then, balancing total deaths that are the direct effect of one disease with total deaths that are the indirect effect of another disease, reach a satisfactory conclusion as to the relative importance of the two diseases.

"If these estimates are to have weight with minds that do their own thinking, they must be made by a trained statistician, and each detail entering into the estimate must be carefully stated, so that each step in the calculation may be subject to review by those who are interested in the subject. As to the reliability of statistical conclusions we wish to quote from Dr. John S. Billings, himself an expert statistician: 'Where the chances are equally good that an observation may differ either on one side or the other from the exact truth it is possible that in the mass the errors on opposite sides will balance each other. The individual bricks turned out from a kiln might differ considerably among themselves, yet one wall of 100 courses of bricks will differ with the same number of courses but very little. A careless writer will sometimes put five words in a line, sometimes ten, yet the number of words in a hundred lines will vary little.'

Certainly no question of greater importance or interest could be raised in regard to the liquor problem than as to the number of deaths occurring annually in the United States which may be traced to its combined direct and indirect effects. Mr. Phelps's book on the "Mortality of Alcohol" is an answer to this question, and the balance of this article purports to be nothing more than a review of that book. The book can be obtained from the Thrift Publishing Co., New York City, for the price of $2 and can be assimilated in six or eight hours' reading:

METHOD ADOPTED BY MR. PHELPS OF ESTIMATING THE NUMBER OF DEATHS TRACEABLE TO LIQUOR.

"Mr. Phelps began by excluding from the 187 causes of death under which the deaths occurring in the United States are tabulated by the Bureau of the Census those causes in which alcohol could not be suspected of having even a remote effect. The excluded list of causes embraced 54 causes of death which are limited in their effect to women and children. Women were excluded from consideration in order that the estimate might be simplified by limiting it to men only, and after reaching satisfactory conclusions in regard to the number of male deaths attributable to alcohol an estimate of the female deaths resulting from alcoholic intemperance could be arrived at with fewer complicating factors. After having excluded 54 causes we have left 133 causes in which to consider the effects of liquor; of the 133 remaining causes 27 were again excluded as not being even in a remote degree the result of the use of liquor. We have left, therefore, 106 causes of deaths in which to study alcohol as a factor in male deaths. Furthermore, as the deaths under the age of 20 and over the age of 74 form such a very small part of male deaths attributable to liquor we may confine our estimate to the study of male deaths between the above ages as possible results of the use of alcohol.

"Three eminently qualified medical experts, with statistical training, were selected, and to each of them, independently, the list of 106 causes of death were submitted, and they were requested to write opposite each cause of death the percentage of deaths listed under that cause for which, in their opinion, liquor was responsible. The three independent estimates were then added, divided by 3, and the average accepted as the percentage of the total number of deaths listed under each particular cause for which alcohol was responsible. Without going into wearisome detail we may say that Mr. Phelps advances good reasons for believing that the average of the three experts would not be altered to any appreciable extent if the average opinion of the entire medical profession on the same facts were obtained.

"To illustrate: It is a well-known fact among medical men that liquor plays an important rôle in the causation of Bright's disease. The three judges, who we may refer to here as X, Y, and Z, stated, respectively, that liquor was responsible for 30, 40, and 20 per cent of the total deaths from Bright's disease. As the census had charged Bright's disease with 22,222 deaths between the twentieth and seventy-fourth years of age, 30 per cent, would be 5,254 of these deaths for which liquor was responsible. In like manner the percentage of deaths from the other 105 causes were calculated. To show how complete the list of 106 causes covered all deaths traceable to liquor Mr. Phelps calls attention to the fact that for 31 of these causes one or other of the three medical experts 'considered the possible alcoholic connection so extremely remote as to justify him in declining to make any estimate.'

THE VERDICT OF STATISTICAL AND MEDICAL EXPERTS AS TO THE ANNUAL NUMBER OF AMERICAN LIVES DESTROYED BY LIQUOR.

"The registration area of the United States has a system for reporting deaths with the cause of death, etc., and comprises 51.8 per cent of our national population. In 1908 there were 320,130 male deaths reported in the registration area; 198,858 of these deaths occurred between the ages of 20 and 74. According to the estimate of the medical and statistical experts, it was found that 10.3 per cent of all male deaths and 13.2 of all adult male deaths were chargeable to liquor. These percentages give us in round numbers for the registration area 32,855 male deaths a year as the result of liquor.

"We must now try to arrive at some conclusion as to the effect of liquor on American women. In New York City only one-fifth as many women died from acute alcoholic poisons, delirium tremens, as died in London from the same cause; moreover, in an investigation by the London police as to the number of women visiting the saloons it was found that 39,541 women entered London saloons in four hours' time. The presence of women in American saloons is comparatively rare. With these facts in mind and after consultation with statisticians and health officers, Mr. Phelps concludes that the women of this country do not use more than 20 per cent as much liquor as is used by men. We would therefore estimate the effect of liquor on our female population as being only one-fifth as severe as is its effect on the male population; therefore, if 13.2 per cent of all male deaths above the age of 20 result from the use of liquor, 2.6 per cent of all female deaths above the age of 20 would be the result of liquor. Now, there were 209,049 female deaths above 20 years of age in the registration area of the United States in 1908; 2.6 per cent of this number would give us 5,435 as the alcoholic female mortality of the registration area."

"Adding the male and female deaths occurring in the registration area we find a total of 38,288 deaths to be the annual harvest of human life in the registration area resulting from alcoholic intemperance.

"The next question is: If 38,288 deaths occur in 51.8 per cent of our national population from alcoholic intemperance, how many deaths occur for the whole population for this cause? After making the necessary corrections for the greater fatality of alcohol on urban than on rural populations, and for the difference in the proportion of rural and urban populations in the registration and nonregistration area of the United States, it is found that the alcoholic mortality of the nonregistration area is 27,609. This figure, added to the 38,288 deaths occurring in the registration area, makes a total of 65,897 deaths occurring each year in the United States that are chargeable to alcoholic intemperance.

"The economic value of the average adult life is estimated by political economists at $4,000. The 65,897 lives destroyed annually by liquor, at $4,000 apiece, amounts to an annual monetary loss of $263,588,000.

"It has been shown that for every unnecessary death there are 700 days of unnecessary sickness. On that estimate alcoholic intemperance produces, in addition to the 65,897 deaths, 46,127,900 days, or 126,377 years, of individual sickness every year in this country.

"Liquor is to blame for 1 out of 12 adult deaths.

"Liquor is to blame for 1 out of 10 male deaths.

"Liquor is to blame for 1 out of 7.5 adult male deaths.

"Liquor is to blame for twice as many deaths a year as are caused by typhoid fever.

"Liquor is to blame for more deaths in four years than were destroyed in the four years of the Civil War.

"The liquor problem is a public-health problem."

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the liquor problem is a public-health problem, a public-wealth problem, a home problem, a happiness problem; it is a problem that should weigh upon the hearts of men until the use of liquor as a beverage shall be stamped out forever. Let us pass this pending bill and thus show our country and the world that we, the Representatives in the greatest Congress of the greatest Nation on earth, are willing to aid and encourage the good men and the godly women throughout the various States of the Union in settling aright this troublesome and perplexing problem. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey will use the 40 minutes' time allotted to him.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I surely hold no brief to defend the liquor dealers. The saloon keepers and the liquor dealers—and I wish the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] would also do me the honor to listen to my simple statement—the saloon keepers and the liquor dealers of Milwaukee are as a rule my opponents and the worst enemies of our cause. The liquor dealers are opposing the cause of Socialism in every city, so far as I know. Among the 2,800 saloon keepers and liquor dealers in Milwaukee I do not believe there are 28 who are members of our party. I do not believe we get one liquor dealer in a hundred. Practically all the liquor dealers are patriotic Republicans or Democrats—in Milwaukee they are both at the same time.

The liquor dealers have no reason to love the Socialists. We do not spend one cent for liquor during elections. We had been in power hardly 10 weeks when we closed up 114 saloons, more than had been closed up in Milwaukee by the Democrats and Republicans combined in the 65 years of Milwaukee's existence.

I repeat, I hold no brief for the saloon keepers. They were one of the most powerful factors in defeating me for reelection. And, moreover, I have always held that liquor is one of the most dangerous enemies of the working class. [Applause.]

Therefore it is only natural that I should reiterate on the floor of this House my belief that liquor is one of the most dangerous enemies of the working class. [Applause.] It is particularly one of the worst foes of the Socialist movement. We can not reason with a drunken man. Socialists must appeal to the man's intellect. A man must be sober when he hears us. He must be a thinking man in order to be able to understand us. A man who drinks to excess can, therefore, never become a good Socialist. He must stay a Republican or a Democrat, though he occasionally may be a Progressive. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. He is sometimes a sociable Democrat.

Mr. BERGER. Yes; he may be occasionally a sociable Democrat, but never a Social Democrat. [Laughter.] Moreover, we appeal to the better nature of the workingman—to his ambition, to his pride. We want to make him dissatisfied with his degraded condition, but a drunken man has no ambition; a drunken man is satisfied. He is a natural slave of his master as he is a slave of his appetite. That is the reason why the Socialist Parties the world over are virtually the greatest temperance organizations in existence. The Social Democratic Party of Germany has decreased the consumption of alcoholic beverages in that country 50 per cent in a single year. Socialists have even decreased the consumption of beer in Munich considerably, which is going some. [Laughter.]

The Socialist Parties the world over—in Germany, in Belgium, in Austria, in France—start voluntary abstinence societies and temperance circles, the leaders setting the example.

I have said that they are great abstainers and great temperance men, but they are not prohibitionists. Prohibition is bad in principle. It infringes upon personal liberty. It is inquisitorial. It is an extreme measure and therefore bound to fail when it becomes the rule.

Moreover, prohibition does not prohibit. It can not control appetite. If a man wants to get intoxicated, he will find ways and means to satisfy his craving. He can get intoxicated on morphine, on cocaine, or on opium. He does not have to get alcohol. If one wants to forget his misery, or if one has some illness that seems to demand intoxication, one can get the toxin in some drug store, and by having prohibition of liquor you simply foster the drug habit. Furthermore, experience has shown that prohibition makes lawbreakers—it makes lawbreaking popular. It seems to be born in man to oppose and violate oppressing laws. Why, in a little town in Michigan I have seen more lawbreakers of that kind in a week than you can see in the whole State of Wisconsin in a year. There are no such laws in Wisconsin and therefore they can not be broken. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In what part of Michigan?

Mr. BERGER. It was in the dry desert of Michigan, where many camels live. Some of them get thirsty. [Laughter.]

Wherever prohibition is not upheld by public opinion—and, as a matter of fact, it is not upheld by public opinion anywhere, not even down South, where, I am told, almost every able-bodied gentleman carries a pocket saloon with him—wherever an oppressive sumptuary law is not upheld by public opinion, it is bound to make lawbreakers. In Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, Kansas, and Minnesota a man who really wants to get liquor can get it. I have not traveled down South very much, but I was given to understand by my good friends who live there that in the South a white man can get anything he wants. [Laughter.]

In Milwaukee, of course, we have no prohibition. Our saloons keep open every day in the year, and some of them even every night of the year—at least that was the case until lately—but you can see more drunkards in a little town in Maine in a day than you can see in the great city of Milwaukee in a week.

Now, I say again that I do not like the saloons as an institution, but the saloon, like many other ills of society, is the outcome of the miserable economic conditions. It is the result of the profit system. And all methods of dealing with the liquor question which do not at the same time elevate the social conditions of the masses of the people and do not involve the elimination of private profit are bound to fail. Better social conditions will also strengthen the man physically.

Mr. LOUD. How about Michigan?

Mr. BERGER. That also holds good in Michigan.

The man with an empty stomach or a man who is ill nourished will get drunk on a glass of beer or a little glass of whisky. Moreover, he is seeking forgetfulness in intoxication. Imagine a man working 10 or 12 hours a day for $1.75, coming home in the evening to a miserable hovel, to his wife and six or seven children. His poor little home may be cold and is uncomfortable. His wife, tired and disagreeable, is finding fault and complaining to him as soon as he gets in, his children look dirty and are quarrelsome. The man has worked hard all day, and he wants to have recreation somewhere for an hour. Are we to be surprised that he goes to the saloon. Some of them go to the saloon even before they go home so as to be prepared for the reception. Gentlemen, if I had to live, with a wife and six or seven children, on $1.75 a day, I do not know but what I might take to drink myself, although I have never been under the influence of liquor in my life.

It is economic conditions that make drunkards, and not drunkards the economic conditions. [Applause.]

The saloon is a mighty poor substitute for a clubhouse, but it is the only clubhouse the capitalist system has provided for the workingman. Before you take away the saloon give him something better. You have no right to take away the saloon unless you provide for him a better place of amusement.

I say the saloon and all its concomitant evils are the outcome of present economic conditions, just as malaria and yellow fever are the outcome of swamps that breed a certain kind of mosquitoes. If we want to do away with malaria and yellow fever, we must drain these swamps—then there will be no mosquitoes to carry the disease. We can not make human beings goods by law as long as we keep up rotten economic conditions and miserable conditions by our laws.

This bill does not look dangerous. It does not seem to have any teeth, and contains no penalty clause. It leaves the punishment to the States. But it is a sneaky, dangerous proposition because it outlaws the liquor trade and makes no exception in favor of beer and wine. It has a tendency to make a moral and legal outlaw of every man who buys or sells a glass of beer in so-called dry territory, and after all is said and done, beer and wine are the best promoters of true temperance—the natural substitutes for whisky, brandy, and other alcoholic liquors. [Applause.]

Society is concerned only with the abuse, not with the use of intoxicants. You have no right to punish men as long as they stay sober. That is what prohibition is doing. That is what this bill is proposing to do in a sort of roundabout way.

Moderate drinking seems to be helpful—not harmful. All nations that have greatly contributed to the civilization of the world have been moderate drinkers. Look at the English, German, French, and Italian and compare them with the Hindus or the Chinese, who are almost teetotallers.

I do not know of a great man in the world's history who was a prohibitionist unless he was great as a prohibitionist.

Washington, Jefferson, Grant, Nepoleon, Bismarck were moderate drinkers. Shakespeare, Goethe, Schiller, Byron, Shelley drank wine and beer whenever they wanted to drink, and their mentality was not impaired thereby.

I am against this bill, gentlemen, from every point of view. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BERGER. I would like two minutes more.

Mr. McCOY. I am sorry; but my time is all promised.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have two minutes more.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to accommodate the gentleman, but the rule fixes the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin have two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. If it is to be subtracted from the time fixed by the House, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I do not indorse all the statements made by the gentleman who has just preceded me—the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER]. There are important questions involved in this bill. The first question is. Do you gentlemen want to prohibit an honest, law-abiding citizen of the United States in a lawful way from ordering whisky for his personal use? If that is your purpose, then your bill is well drawn. I do not want the Congress of the United States to be sailing under false colors. I am not going to discuss the legal phases involved in this matter, but I want the country to know what the attitude of gentlemen supporting this measure is on the question. You have gone before the people with a proposition that your purpose was to do away with the saloon and that you had no idea of interfering with the private rights of the citizen.

Now, in good faith a large number of our people in this country joined hands with you to vote out the saloon. They acted in good faith. Now you come by this bill with a proposition to the people who joined hands with you in good faith in voting out the saloons and say to them that, having done this, we now propose to enact a law so that you can not order whisky for your own personal use. Now, I want to say to you gentlemen who think that you are sailing under a popular issue that, if you are sincere in your statement that this bill will not deprive a citizen of the United States in a lawful manner from ordering whisky for his own personal use, then what objection can you have to the amendment which I submit? When you say to the American people that this bill will not prevent a citizen from ordering and receiving whisky for his personal use you are mistaken, in my judgment, as to the intelligence of the people.

You say in this bill that no shipment shall be made where the secret intention of any party to the contract is to violate the law of the State where the shipment is to be delivered. Why do you believe that you could go into the remotest part of this country and deceive an intelligent man when you pass such a law by saying to him that we have not interfered with his private rights? He will know in a moment that a man selling whisky in another State would not take the chances of being prosecuted or becoming involved on account of the secret intention of the consignee. You all know, and the people all know, and all my good friends hiding behind the cloak of public sentiment ought to know, that the people are intelligent enough to know that the great carriers of this country, the railroads and express companies, are not going to run the risk of being involved in a prosecution on account of the secret intention of a man living in another State whom they do not know, simply for the purpose of collecting a small revenue of 40 cents.

When this law is passed, if the liquor dealer is willing to ship to a bona fide citizen, if he is willing to take the chance, do you suppose that the carrier will say, "I will accept this package and I will ship it to Georgia" or some other point for a charge of 40 cents and involve itself with the secret intention of the man who sent the order?

Why, gentlemen, you can not fool the people with that idea. You say this bill does not mean that a private citizen can not order for his private use. You might as well meet the question. Come out into the open and say to the people, "We have driven by your aid whisky out of the saloons and now we propose, having accepted your aid in good faith, to drive it out of your homes." That is what this bill means; and, in my judgment, those that are most actively behind this measure know that the ultimate effect of this bill will be to drive whisky in any form out of the homes of the law-abiding citizens of this country.

If you want to go that far, well and good, but if you want to be fair with the people of the United States who have stood by you in voting out the saloons, then you ought to adopt this amendment:

Amend, line 12, page 2, by striking out the period and adding "Provided, That nothing contained in this bill shall be so construed as to prevent any citizen of the United States from purchasing, ordering, or having shipped, or to prevent any common carrier or agent thereof from accepting, receiving, transporting, or delivering spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind in reasonable quantities when the same is plainly marked on the outside of the package 'For personal use': Provided further, That no common carrier or agent thereof shall make such delivery to any person, whether marked 'For personal use' or not, if the person ordering the same has been convicted of violating the prohibition laws of any county, State, or municipality, if the fact of such conviction appears of record in the courts of record in the county or parish where such shipment is to be delivered by the common carrier or agent thereof; or to any person who holds or possesses a Federal license or tax to retail spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind; or if the courts of record of any such county or parish show that the person ordering such spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind has been convicted of public drunkenness."

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACKMON. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. HOBSON. It is merely to ask whether the gentleman thinks that that would not be an object devoutly to be desired in the end.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the great masses of the American people will ever stand for any such proposition, whether it affects liquor or not. Shall the Members of Congress say that they will regulate the personal habits of the people? [Applause.]

It will never happen, and it will never happen by my vote, especially coming from the State that I do, when in good faith for 10 years in the Alabama State Senate I helped the prohibitionists, so called, to enact every law that they asked me to vote for until we reached the constitutional amendment, and I voted against it, and my people in that State, by a majority of 20,000 votes, voted down that gag proposition, which was not one-half so injurious to the rights of the people as is this bill. Twenty-nine thousand majority of my people agreed with me on my proposition, and my judgment is that if there be gentlemen who believe that the great masses of the American people can be deceived by such a bill, they are going to be very much mistaken. Whatever the result may be, for myself I propose to support the amendment which I have offered that protects that class which the proponents of this bill say they are trying to protect. I prevent the delivery of whisky to a man who has been convicted of violating the prohibition law. I prevent the delivery of whisky to a man who has been convicted of public drunkenness. I prevent the delivery of whisky to a man who holds a Federal license, or Federal tax, more properly speaking, in prohibited territory. How much further do you want to go? Why, you want to dodge behind the proposition that you are not interfering with the rights of the private citizen. Gentlemen, I predict to-day that you will not be able to do it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may have the same privilege. I was on my feet ready to interpose an objection unless the privilege is enjoyed by all gentlemen who speak on the bill.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the pending measure shall have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I suggest as a substitute for that that all Members be given that right.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to accept that.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if this is the same request that the gentleman from Alabama preferred a few moments ago?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is, as I amended the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin. It did not comprehend the proposition advanced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is all a matter of unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, has not the unanimous consent now being proffered already been ordered by the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not. It was refused.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, what is the request?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] objected to this same request a few moments ago, and that the matter ought to be put in his presence rather than his absence.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is not the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, out of whose time does this come—not out of mine?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the pending measure be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that that request be made in the presence of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts object?

Mr. MURRAY. I object for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, it is about 12 years ago that legislation to prohibit the interstate shipment of liquor into dry territory was first attempted in this House. It was shortly after the decision of the Supreme Court on the Wilson law when the first bill of this character made its appearance in the Committee on the Judiciary, and from that time to this I have carefully listened to all the arguments for and against not only this measure but all other bills of similar purport. Speaking from experience and a somewhat intimate knowledge of the questions involved I dare say it is preposterous as well as unjust to the membership of the House to undertake the disposal of this bill after a limited discussion of only three hours. It could hardly be considered in all its phases in three days.

Outside of the constitutional question, there are questions of policy and of the merits and effect of the legislation involved, and I am sure, if the members generally understood its far-reaching consequences and the dangerous precedent to be established by it, many of them who are now favorably disposed to the bill would hesitate to give it their support. This is exactly what happened to the members of five different Judiciary Committees, which, as is well known, persistently declined to report the bill. In every Congress during the last 12 years a majority of the Judiciary Committee at first favored the bill, but after listening to the arguments against it shrunk from reporting it out. Why? Because their consciences would not permit them to violate the oath they had made to uphold the Constitution. If there was sufficient time for discussion, no doubt the same thing would happen in this House.

But it is plain that the bill is to be railroaded through to-day. The Democracy is in the saddle, and, feeling its oats, that party is bent on riding roughshod over all the caution and sagacity which kept Republican Congresses for, lo, these many years from doing violence to vested rights and to the fundamental law of the country. The responsibility rests on the party which is now in control of this House.

While I represent one of the largest beer-producing districts of the country, I hold no brief from either the brewers or the retailers. But two years ago the people of my State voted on the question of prohibition and buried it under a majority of 217,000 votes, my own district leading this prohibition funeral with over 70,000 majority. So I hold a brief from the people whom I have the honor to represent which commands me to oppose this bill because it commits Congress to the folly of prohibition through the tender of its aid to prop up State prohibitory laws.

By the passage of this bill prohibition will be invested with the dignity of a great national issue, and I speak on behalf of millions of liberal-minded American citizens when I say we are ready to meet this issue. The friends of personal liberty have been comparatively quiet and silent all these years, but now that Congress for the first time in its history is about to go on record in favor of an attempt to tyrannize the people in matters of personal conduct they will be aroused to feverish activity and the fight for the preservation of individual rights will begin in earnest. It is silly to think that it will merely be a fight between the temperance forces on one side and the liquor interests on the other. Liberty-loving Americans have realized long ago that what confronts them is a clash of two different currents of thought, a struggle, in fact, of two civilizations, the Puritan and the Germanic, the one reveling in human misery, the other rejoicing in human happiness, the one bending people downward to the grave, the other turning their heads upward to the sun of heaven. This struggle between the powers of darkness and the powers of light, between moroseness and self-castigation one one side and good cheer, sociability, and happy laughter on the other is as old as the world, but as to the final outcome there can be no doubt.

Liberty and voluntary temperance will triumph over coercion and prohibition. The first organization to enlist in the cause of personal freedom will be the German-American alliance, 2,000,000 strong, but there are others. Let me read to you a letter which I have recently received in relation to the pending bill from the Missouri State branch of that great organization. It is as follows:

Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The National German-American Alliance of Missouri, comprising over 160 societies of various kinds and embracing more than 68,000 citizens of the United States, respectfully request you not to vote for any bill such as S. 4043, as previously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate or any bills with similar tendency now pending in Congress undertaking to exercise police power in furthering prohibition in any State, as if within the purview of the interstate-commerce law.

As citizens of this country we claim to be second to none in our devotion to the cause of true temperance and to all that makes for the sanctity and purity of the home, and decency and order in the State; but we are bitterly opposed to the passage of any law that destroys our purely personal rights, and for the protection of these rights we stand united as one body. As free and sovereign members of free and sovereign people, we claim the right to regulate our lives and our homes as we see fit, in so far as we do not injure others. The right to drink wine or beer, and to bring them into our homes, we consider as absolute an attribute of human liberty as is the right to buy food. The enactment of such laws would cause this inalienable right of each person to pursue his own happiness in his own way, so long as he does not injure anyone, to be sacrificed to the fanaticism of those who regard the manufacture of or traffic in any alcoholic beverage as a crime and the partaker as a criminal.

We German-Americans have never allowed our love for food and drink to degenerate into intemperance or to interfere with the good of the community, and we regard these bills as an unjustifiable invasion of our manhood rights and of human freedom and as misleading and iniquitous measures, because tending to encourage drunkenness through clandestine tippling and thereby causing evasion of and contempt for the law of the land.

We therefore respectfully but earnestly pray for the defeat of all measures having the deleterious tendencies above referred to, such as Senate bill No. 4043.

THE NATIONAL GERMAN-AMERICAN ALLIANCE,
STATE DIVISION MISSOURI,
Dr. CHAS. H. WEINSBERG, President,
GEO. WITHUM, Secretary,
AUG. H. HOFFMANN, Treasurer,
WM. C. F. LENZ, National Representative.

And right in line with this earnest and dignified protest permit me to quote from an argument made by the president of the National German-American Alliance, Dr. C. J. Hexamer, before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on this bill on March 9, 1912. He said:

In every crisis, in colonial times as well as during our national existence, the German element in our land has stood for order and good common sense, and has always counseled well. As early as 1688 our forefathers at Germantown passed the first of all protests against slavery. What misery would have been averted had their advice then been heeded. Their declaration for independence at Philadelphia antedates that of Jefferson; they fed and clothed the army of Washington at Valley Forge; they gave the cause of liberty a De Kalb, Steuben, "the Father of the American Army," a Herkimer, and a Muhlenberg. A Stricker and an Armistead defended and saved Baltimore in 1814; about 200,000 of them fought and bled that not one star should be torn from the field of blue of our glorious banner; and when the fiat-money craze spread over the country, they, regardless of party, stood as one man for national honor and honesty, voting for sound money. We plead again to-day, because we honestly believe that the passage of this bill would be a grievous mistake, creating a precedent the final outcome of which can not now be foreseen, and because we feel that it would be an irreparable blow to individual liberty and the sacred institutions of our country.

In the words of that great American jurist, Hon. James C. Carter: "Any legislation which bears the characteristics of tyranny, as I have defined that term, is vicious in theory, and has never yet succeeded, and never will succeed, in gaining its avowed end, or in having any other than an injurious effect; and I venture to add that if the zeal and labors which have been employed by what are called the better classes of society in efforts to enact and enforce laws repressive of liberty had been expended in kindly and sympathetic efforts to change and elevate the thoughts and desires of those less fortunate than themselves a benefit would have been reaped in the diminution of misery and crime, which compulsory laws could never accomplish. Moral ends can never be gained except by moral means. All the advances in civilization and morality which society has thus far made are due to the cultivation and development of those moral sympathies which find their activity in cooperation and mutual aid."

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me briefly discuss the constitutional question involved in this bill. A mere cursory examination will show that it is in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States. It will be noted that while the bill forbids the shipment of liquors into prohibition States, it provides no penalty for the violation of the law by a railway company, steamship line, or other transportation agency. A bill providing that certain actions shall be prohibited, but imposing no penalties for violations of the law, is so absurd that it at once suggests the question: "Why is no penalty prescribed?" The answer is that the interests behind these bills know that it would be impossible to punish infringements of the law, as Congress has no power to enact such a measure. Besides to inflict a penalty would, in the opinion of the Anti-Saloon League, break down the prohibition movement and make prohibition "unpopular and ridiculous."

By various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, notably Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) and American Express Co. v. State of Iowa (195 U. S., 133), it has been held that a citizen of one State has the right to import liquor from another State. It has also been uniformly held by that court that the regulation of commerce between the States or between foreign countries and the States is wholly confided to Congress by the Constitution. The various kinds of liquors whose transportation it is proposed to prohibit have been held by the Supreme Court to be articles of commerce in which a right of traffic exists, and they are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world and the laws of Congress.

In regard to the transportation of liquors imported from foreign countries, it has been held by the Supreme Court that the right to import carries with it the right to transportation into any State without regard to the laws of such State. In the case of Brown against State of Maryland, decided in 1827, it was held that the absence of a law by Congress as to the importation of any article of commerce is equivalent to a declaration that the importation of that article into the States is unrestricted; and that any article whose importation into the United States is permitted has the right to enter the interior of any State.

In the case of Vance v. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438) it was held by the Supreme Court, in an opinion delivered by the present Chief Justice, that—

> The right of persons in one State to ship into another State to a resident for his own use is derived from the Constitution of the United States and does not rest on the grant of the State law.

The only possible conclusion to be drawn from these various decisions is: That so long as the laws of Congress permit the importation of liquors into the United States a law prohibiting their transportation into certain States would be void, as the transportation of articles of commerce to their destination is a necessary right attaching to their importation. It follows that the proposed law is wholly ineffectual in so far as it aims to prevent the shipment into prohibition States of liquors brought from a foreign country into the United States.

But even though it is possible to recognize the right of foreign alcoholic liquors to interstate commerce, and at the same time to take away such right from domestic liquors intended for shipment into States which have enacted prohibitory laws, these decisions show very clearly that Congress can not discriminate between domestic liquors shipped from a State permitting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages into another State where a like permission is granted, and the shipment of such liquors into a State which has enacted prohibitory laws. Congress must either totally deny the right of domestic liquors to interstate commerce or permit their shipment into all the States, irrespective of the fact that some of the States may have enacted prohibitory laws. Or, in other words, if the right which exists to-day to ship whisky, beer, etc., from the State of Kentucky to the State of Kansas is to be denied, then the right to ship whisky and beer from New York to Connecticut must be denied. Congress can not declare that whisky and beer are proper articles of commerce for consumption by citizens of the United States resident in the State of New York and improper articles of commerce for consumption by citizens of the United States resident in the State of Kansas. While Congress can not interfere with the exercise by a State of the police power as affecting the people who reside therein, Congress has the power, as shown by these decisions, to insist that no class of citizens of the United States shall be denied the right to purchase articles which other classes can purchase, through the admission by Congress of such articles to interstate commerce. If the right to purchase and transport recognized articles of commerce is denied to citizens of the United States resident in one State, then it must be denied to the citizens of the United States resident in all the States.

Section 2 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

> The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

The plain construction of this article is that laws enacted by Congress affecting the citizens of the United States must be uniform in their application, and that Congress can not by a general law give citizens of the United States residing in one State privileges not accorded to citizens residing in other States, or impose restrictions on the commerce of citizens of the United States residing in one State that are not imposed on citizens residing in other States. The proposition to take by Federal legislation from the citizens of certain States the right to import recognized articles of commerce, while permitting citizens of other States to import such articles, is in direct violation of the right guaranteed by the Constitution to equal privileges and immunities for all citizens of each State.

The Kenyon bill embodies a special grant of powers not hitherto possessed by the States, but reserved to the Federal Government by express requirement of the Federal Constitution. Should Congress permit the States to erect trade barriers with reference to a single article of lawful commerce, the whole power of the Federal Government to prevent that division of the States into warring, commercial sections would be surrendered. And the theory that Congress may and should perform such an act of violence to the Constitution and the Federal Government itself and leave it to the courts to right any wrong, is one of the most dangerous propositions ever submitted to a legislative body sworn to support the Constitution. It is an assumption that the courts and not Congress are to support and enforce the Constitution, and that Congress is a mere clerical body bound to enact into law the whims of persons who, unmindful of the true nature of our Government and the just limitations of State powers, seek their own ends.

The pending bill is absurd, economically ruinous, and destructive of the great fabric of the Federal compact. Congress has no right to take the property of any citizen by legislation and without some form of redress or compensation, and can not delegate such power to States or organized bodies or individual citizens. If Congress abdicate and also authorize States to despoil the commerce of their neighbors and erect trade barriers, the Union will have been destroyed by act of Congress. For Congress has no graver duty than to obey the letter and spirit of the Constitution and prevent that very tragedy of a great Nation.

At one period of the Civil War, when the Federal forces had penetrated the cotton-growing States, vast quantities of garnered cotton were seized and sold as a war measure. Some years after peace was restored, Congress provided means for paying many of those who had thus suffered loss of property. Final justice was done even in a matter arising in the heat of conflict. It is well to recall, briefly, this history of a past that is not very far away, but which may have been forgotten by those now proposing a grant of the power of spoliation of lawful property to States without redress in time of peace.

In our history as a Nation, there have been many threatening movements and episodes, but none has been more threatening or baseless than that for spoliation by the States and consequent commercial disunion. How long can political union exist when commercial disunion is enacted by Congress?

So much for that. Having demonstrated that this bill contemplates a wanton attack on the Federal Constitution, now let me show you how completely unnecessary this legislation is in order to accomplish the purpose which it seeks to accomplish. That purpose is to prevent people living in prohibition States from securing liquor from outside of the State. It is true that under the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court an interstate shipment can not be interfered with until it is delivered to the consignee, but it is also true that the moment the consignee attempts to dispose of it, by sale or otherwise, it becomes subject to the State prohibitory law and, consequently, to seizure and destruction. Hence, if the State authorities did their duty in enforcing the State prohibition law, the very object of the bill under consideration would be attained without any aid from Congress whatsoever. It may be argued that an enormous police force would be necessary to watch violations, but that is the penalty of trying to enact and enforce Russian statutes. The cry for help which comes to Congress from the prohibition States is really a humiliating confession that these States either will not or can not enforce their own laws. If they fail to exhaust their own powers, they do not come here with clean hands, and their appeals are, consequently, not entitled to a hearing; and if, on the other hand, they can not enforce prohibition, even with the exercise of due diligence, then Congress should regard this as convincing proof that all prohibitory legislation is absolutely futile. In either case there is not a shadow of an excuse for interference by the law-making power of the Federal Government. I say again, if the State authorities can not furnish to Congress complete proof of its inability to suppress the traffic and of its entire good faith in the exercise to the utmost limit of its powers to that end, then I claim they have no moral right to invoke the power of Congress. And if, on the other hand, practical experience has demonstrated all honest attempts at suppression to have been futile, simply because of the inefficiency of all law in preventing people from obtaining what they desire, then, I say, it is absolutely useless to provide additional legal machinery for that purpose, because to do so would have no other effect than to undermine and destroy the authority and dignity of national law in the eyes of the people. Is there within the reach of my voice an advocate of the pending bill who can refute or break down this logic?

And is it not the duty of Congress, when it enters upon the field of sumptuary legislation, to inquire whether such legislation is backed by public opinion sufficiently to render it capable of enforcement? On that score I am able to give you some interesting facts and figures. There were relatively more arrests and more crimes in dry States than in wet States, and when I say dry I mean officially dry, for there is no real dry State in the Union. The milder beverages are consumed to a much larger extent in wet States than in dry ones, while, vice versa, strong drinks are more in demand in dry than in wet territory. The direct effect of prohibition legislation has been to increase the consumption of ardent spirits and to decrease that of beer and wine, and the figures of the Internal Revenue Office show that in no period of our history has the consumption of whisky increased more rapidly than during the last 10 years, the time of the greatest prohibition agitation; in fact a comparison between the increase of liquor consumption and population shows such a disproportion in favor of the former as to alarm the true friends of temperance and to stamp the whole prohibition agitation as an utter and miserable failure. Certainly, if the professional prohibition lobbyists, who have their headquarters here in Washington and are waxing fat as a result of their agitation, had been advance agents of liquor houses they could not have been more successful. But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. We also learn from the official reports that during the last fiscal year not less than 2,488 illicit stills were suppressed by the agents of the Government, and the majority of these were located in dry territory. And how many may there be still in operation? When we consider that there are only 924 legitimate distilleries in the whole country we can form a faint idea of the extent to which "moonshining" is now carried on, and as Government-taxed, legitimate liquor interferes with their business we are not surprised to learn that the "moonshiners" are making common cause with the prohibitionists to keep liquor out of their territory, as they are reported to have done in West Virginia. I am sure there is not a single "moonshiner" in the country who does not favor the very bill we are now considering.

These facts, Mr. Speaker, will give us an inkling of what will happen when this bill is put upon the statute books. For temperance purposes it will be absolutely nugatory, because if spirituous and malt liquors for which the Government tax has been paid is kept out of the prohibition States the demand will simply be supplied by the "moonshiners," and, besides, an expenditure of a few dollars will suffice to enable every farmer to produce himself all the liquor he may require, and in this way we are turning every farm and every home into a private distillery. Does any sane man believe that we could employ a sufficient force of Government agents to cope with this situation? You may pass a hundred laws like the one under consideration, and you will not thereby be able to promote the cause of temperance, simply because you can no more make a man temperate or abstemious by law than you can make him honest by law, and for this reason prohibition, whether backed by State or National law, or by both, will always and everywhere be an ignominious failure.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote here the opinions of some representative newspapers regarding the pending bill. Under the headline "Lobbying for Tyranny," the New York World of December 18, 1912, said:

In the various prohibition States it is a crime to manufacture, sell, or give away intoxicants. It is a crime to have liquor in the house. It is a crime for a traveler passing through dry territory to take a drink from a pocket flask.

Because some of these offenses happen every day, those who are more intent upon regulating the habits of the people than upon enforcing the law want Congress by the exercise of its great powers to come to their assistance. They want a Federal law prohibiting interstate shipments in such cases. They want the Nation to make their State laws effective. They want to say what their neighbors shall and shall not drink, and then they would like to turn the whole matter over to the United States Government for administration.

The right of a State to outlaw commodities and practices elsewhere perfectly lawful must be conceded, but the responsibility for the execution of the policy is its own. If most of its people offend and its jails are not commodious enough to accommodate them, there is the best of evidence that public opinion is either hostile or hypocritical. In any event, there are excellent reasons why the central Government should not exercise a tyranny over the people.

And under date of December 17, 1912, the Washington Post says:

THE KENYON BILL.

Enough was developed in the debate in the Senate yesterday on the Kenyon interstate shipping bill, wherein it is sought to legislate on the shipment of intoxicating liquors from "wet" into "dry" territory, to establish the doubtful wisdom of the passage of such a measure.

In the first place the inquiries made by the strongest lawyers in the Senate of those Senators who advocated the bill clearly show that, in the judgment of these lawyers, there is grave doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to delegate its control of interstate commerce to the laws of the States and the whim and caprice of State officials.

When the advocates of the measure were forced to concede through these inquiries that the second section of the Kenyon bill is of doubtful constitutionality, they made the practical concession that the bill in its entirety is unconstitutional, for section 1 of the proposed bill makes the laws of the States, whatever they may be, the rule by which interstate shipments are to be controlled.

That this is dangerous and pernicious legislation is best shown by the fact that if the inviolability of interstate commerce from State interference is once jeopardized with respect to one article of interstate commerce, it establishes a precedent that may arise to plague the makers of our laws upon other articles of legitimate commerce at the behest of agitators in one or more of the States.

Of the 48 States now in the Union but 8 States have State-wide laws prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquors. Others have county, municipal, parish, or township prohibition of manufacture and sale. No State prohibits the use of liquors or their possession for personal use. Nearly all States have search and seizure laws. It looks as if, aside from the constitutional validity of a measure delegating to the States the regulation of interstate shipments of liquor, the advocates of the Kenyon bill should devote their energies to the enforcement of State laws of unquestioned validity. Strict enforcement of State laws would accomplish all that the advocates of the Kenyon bill assert they are seeking.

The Kenyon bill, aside from its verbiage, proposes to subject interstate shipments of liquors to the operation of State laws before the interstate shipment is completed by delivery to the consignee.

If further congressional regulation of interstate liquor shipments is desired beyond the criminal-code provisions with respect to marking the kind and quantity of liquor and the name of the consignor on the package, it would appear preferable to have the regulation contained in an act of Congress which would furnish a national rule, and not to subject foreign and interstate shipments of liquor to as many different interstate regulations as there are States in the Union.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I would also like unanimous consent for the same purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to have unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky also asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I joined in reporting to this House the pending bill in order that the House might express its opinion on the questions, both of law and of policy involved; having voted for the bill in committee, I shall vote for it here, but I was not then, and am not now, content with the form in which it appears before this body. In conjunction with some of my colleagues on the committee, I have filed a report suggesting to the House certain amendments and have offered the same to be read from the Clerk's desk. One of these amendments declares it not to be the purpose of the bill to prohibit shipments for sacramental purposes or for the personal use or consumption of the owner or consignee. The other provides what penalty shall be incurred by those who persist in making the sort of shipments which the bill forbids. These amendments are in the judgment of myself and my colleagues not only important but absolutely vital, since, as we see it, the bill without them is of doubtful virtue to accomplish any purpose, good or bad.

I would have been content, Mr. Speaker, to stand upon the brief exposition of our views set forth in the memorandum we have already filed, if it were not that there seems to have been a more or less deliberate effort to spread abroad the impression that our amendments were not offered in good faith or from the standpoint of friendship to this measure. I perceive that already this effort has so far succeeded that gentleman on this floor who approve both the language and the purpose of these amendments are disposed not to support them for fear that they may be suspected of hostility to the objects of the bill.

I can understand how those who are against the bill in any form can oppose these amendments because of a natural desire to leave the bill as imperfect and as powerless as possible, but I can not for the life of me understand why the friends of the measure should oppose an amendment as to sacramental and personal use, which will bring the bill into harmony with the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, or an amendment imposing a penalty, which will give to the bill all the vitality and force of which it is capable and furnish whatever defense is possible to the constitutional objections urged against it.

As the bill stands it simply declares that shipments of intoxicating liquor intended to be used in violation of State laws is prohibited; and having so said, it is silent. As I shall seek to point out, this is, in my judgment, simply equivalent to a resolution that the Members of Congress do not approve of the illicit traffic in liquors; only this and nothing more.

With such a declaration no reasonable man can disagree; certainly I do not. Each State has the undoubted right to determine for itself the manner in which the sale of intoxicants shall be regulated or the terms on which it shall be permitted, if at all. Whether it adopts the policy of license or the dispensary system, the prohibition of manufacture and sale, or prohibition in any other form, the law ought to be respected and enforced to the letter. My own State of West Virginia last fall, by an overwhelming majority, declared in favor of the constitutional prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. I have no doubt that in due course legislation will be enacted to carry this constitutional declaration into effect, and it is my earnest hope that when enacted it will be enforced with vigor and sincerity. The principle involved goes beyond the mere question of intoxicating liquors and involves the supremacy of all written law. Speaking for myself, I shall support, as a Member of Congress, within the bounds of the Constitution and the limits of good reason, any and all legislation which will assist in the enforcement of whatever law my State or any other shall adopt. I have no sympathy with the "bootlegger" or "speak-easy" keeper, whether he operates in a prohibition State, a license State, or a dispensary State, and he ought to be put out of business in one just as quickly as in another. Neither have I any sympathy with a man outside the State who knowingly and intentionally assists him to violate the law. I should be only too glad to believe that this bill in its present form would put them both under the ban of the law.

But these questions are not involved here. This bill, like every other, must be judged by its own language and effect and not by the praiseworthy purpose of any of its advocates.

PERSONAL AND SACRAMENTAL USE.

I have suggested as an amendment that there be added to the bill this clause:

That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to forbid the shipment or transportation of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind intended for sacramental purposes or for the personal use or consumption of the owner or consignee thereof.

In presenting this amendment I am defending a principle approved by the Supreme Court of the United States itself, and I am thus saving the bill from a construction which would destroy it, and putting into language too plain to be misunderstood the expressed purpose of the author and proponents of the bill themselves.

It must be remembered that no State has forbidden to its citizens the right to possess intoxicating liquors for their own personal use and consumption.

In Vance v. Vandercook (170 U. S., 452) the Supreme Court said:

But the right of persons in one State to ship liquor into another State to a resident for his own use is derived from the Constitution of the United States and does not rest on the grant of the State law. Either the conditions attached by the State law unlawfully restrain the right or they do not. If they do, and we shall hereafter examine this condition, then they are void. If they do not, then there is no lawful ground of complaint on the subject.

And again, in the case of Pabst Brewing Co. v. Crenshaw (198 U. S., 17) Justice White said:

In so far, however, as the State law imposed burdens on the right to ship liquor from another State to a resident of South Carolina intended for his own use and not for sale within the State, the law was held to be repugnant to the Constitution, because the Wilson Act, whilst it delegated to the State plenary power to regulate the sale of liquors in South Carolina shipped into the State from other States, did not recognize the right of a State to prevent an individual from ordering liquors from outside of the State of his residence for his own consumption and not for sale.

What did the author of this bill intend on this subject? It is an open secret, Mr. Speaker, that this bill was drafted by a lawyer of some distinction in the State of Oklahoma—certainly by a gentleman of intelligence, as shown by his testimony before committees of this Congress. Let me read here his language before the Judiciary Committee of the House on the 5th day of March last.

He said:

I contend in the same way Congress might so regulate commerce as to take away this right for personal use. But, speaking for Oklahoma, I say to you that we are not asking that, because down there we are prohibitionists of this sort—we are prohibitionists because we are opposed to the traffic and the institution of the saloon. We do not berate the man just because he uses, in a decent way, intoxicating liquor, although, speaking for myself, I am a total abstainer. But we believe that if the use of intoxicating liquor had at all times been confined to the home—personal use in the home—there never would have been the question of prohibition.

So that primarily we prohibit the sale of those things in order to strike down that traffic—the open saloon and its attendant and kindred evils. If the time should ever come when, in order to protect the morals and the public welfare of the State of Oklahoma, it should, in the opinion of the legislative power of the State, become necessary to prohibit the personal use of intoxicating liquor, who ought to have the right to exercise that power—the Congress of the United States or the State of Oklahoma? We say that Congress has nothing to do with that question, and that it is none of Congress's business whether the people in the State of Oklahoma shall drink liquor, have it in their homes for their personal use, or whether they shall sell it.

For myself, I concur in his statement that it is not the business of Congress whether the people of Oklahoma or any other State shall have liquor in their homes for their personal use or shall use it for sacramental purposes; and I insist that this law shall be so defined as to accord with that principle and with the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman state whose testimony it was from which he was just reading?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. That was the statement of Mr. Fred S. Caldwell, of Oklahoma City, draftsman of this bill.

I read again from the published hearings had before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, on the 17th day of February last, the following statement from the Rev. E. C. Dinwiddie, legislative representative of the Antisaloon League:

Mr. DINWIDDIE. Now, I will say to the doctor, for his information, along the line of the point that the court has said that that is a constitutional right—and he and I will not have any argument about that—that it is a constitutional right for a man in one State to have shipped to him alcoholic liquors from another State. It is his right to receive those liquors. The Wilson law simply has the effect of preventing his selling them in unbroken packages if the law of his State forbids it. But that constitutional right that Dr. BARTHOLDT speaks of is the same constitutional right the Supreme Court held in the Bowman case and the Leisey v. Hardin case—was the right not only to receive in the original unbroken package, but the right to sell in the original unbroken package, the State law to the contrary notwithstanding. They used the same language then, saying it was a constitutional right. Congress took away by direct legislation the constitutional right the man had to sell liquor in the original package, if he received it through the channels of interstate or foreign commerce. That is a correct statement, which I am ready to rest upon before any committee of lawyers or anybody else.

Representative BARTHOLDT. Not at all. That was not a constitutional right at all——

Mr. DINWIDDIE. The Supreme Court said so.

Representative BARTHOLDT. Under the decision of the Supreme Court it was decided to be a constitutional right to receive an interstate shipment. In other words, an interstate shipment is not delivered until it is delivered to the hands of the consignee. But the very moment it leaves the hands of the consignee the State law goes into effect, and that is why I have always argued that this legislation is unnecessary, for the reason that as soon as a consignee receives a shipment of liquor and tries to dispose of it by sale or otherwise the State law is in effect, and you can prevent him from doing it without any law enacted by Congress.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. I am free to say that if the constituents of the doctor and those who buy their products for sale were men who would absolutely obey the laws of their States we would probably not need this legislation; but the keepers of blind tigers and speak-easies all over the country, at whom exclusively this legislation is aimed, do not always respect the law—and I rest on the language of the bills for this statement. I say that a plain, careful reading of that bill can not give anybody the impression that we are trying to prevent by congressional legislation the importation or use of intoxicating liquors for family or personal use.

This would certainly seem to be plain enough, and yet, Mr. Speaker, I received in my mail this morning a letter, a copy of which I suppose was received by every other Member of the House, upon stationery headed "The Anti-Saloon League of America" and signed by Edwin C. Dinwiddie, its "legislative superintendent." The right of that organization to promote this or similar legislation and the right of that gentleman as its representative to do what he legitimately can to bring about its passage, I do not for one moment challenge. I ask only the right to compare a portion of that letter with his testimony which I have just read. He says in his letter:

Besides an attempt to put on a penalty clause, our friends are asked to be on guard against the effort to attach a provision to exempt liquors imported for personal use. We contend this is purely a State matter. Such a clause is against the real policy and underlying principle of the bill. It will shackle and hobble the States while the whole intent of the measure is to unfetter them. It will legalize the introduction of liquors for personal use when that whole question should properly be left to State control.

We earnestly urge the friends of this legislation to resist to the very last any effort to attach a "personal use" clause to the bill, a plan which the liquor interests have been urging for 10 years past, whenever this legislation has been seriously feared by them.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what has been urged in years past; I do not know what may be urged by others now, but I deny with emphasis that in urging this particular amendment, I speak as a friend of the liquor interests or for or in their behalf.

Of course, the suggestion made in this letter that this bill would "legalize" everything it may not directly prohibit, is too ridiculous and absurd for serious consideration. The bill, of course, "legalizes" nothing. It does pretend to render certain things which are named unlawful.

Before the Senate committee we are told that—

A plain, careful reading of that bill can not give anybody the impression that we are trying to prevent by congressional legislation the importation or use of intoxicating liquors for family or personal use.

And yet, when we undertake to make the bill read to that effect in plain, unmistakable, honest, straightforward English, we are told this morning by letter from the same hand that—

Such a clause is against the real policy and underlying principle of the bill.

Others may reconcile these statements if they can; I can not. Further comment upon them and upon the bald contradiction between them is superfluous.

PENALTY CLAUSE.

I propose as another amendment to the bill that there shall be added a clause substantially as follows:

And whoever shall knowingly ship, transport, or deliver to any common carrier for shipment or transportation, or shall knowingly cause induce, or procure to be shipped, transported, or delivered to any common carrier for shipment or transportation from one State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, with intent to receive, possess, sell, or use the same therein, or to cause, induce, or procure the same to be received, possessed, sold, or used therein, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of the laws of such State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 or imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than 2 years, or both.

This bill undertakes to strike out on a new line. I can not agree with my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], who contends that it is similar in character with bills which have been urged from the same source in years gone by. In order that I may be clearly understood, it is necessary to call attention to the difference between this bill and bills in relation to the interstate shipment of intoxicating liquors which have been proposed in previous Congresses.

As is well known, after the Supreme Court had decided the case of Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), Congress, on August 8, 1890, passed the Wilson Act to the effect that:

All fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Subsequently, in the cases of In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545) and Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412), the Supreme Court declared this act constitutional, but held, however, that the words "upon arrival in such State or Territory" meant arrival at the point of destination and delivery to the consignee.

In each succeeding Congress bills were introduced proposing, in effect, to amend the Wilson Act by inserting after the words "upon arrival" the words "within the boundary of the State" and "before delivery to the consignee," the intent of such amendment being to subject intoxicating liquors to State or Territorial laws at any time after they had crossed the geographical boundary of the State or Territory. Such a bill was pending in the Sixtieth Congress and was exhaustively considered.

In a report which emanated from the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate Senator Knox summarized the objections to such a bill as follows:

My conclusions are:
1. Interstate shipments are not completed until they reach the consignee.
2. An interruption or interference with interstate shipments before they reach the consignee constitutes a regulation of commerce.
3. Regulating interstate-commerce shipments is an exclusive function of Congress.
4. Congress can not delegate any part of its exclusive power to the States.
5. To remove the bar or impediment of exclusive Federal power which shuts the States out of Federal domain, and thereby allow them to enter that domain, is to permit or sanction a State law in violation of the Constitution and, in effect, to delegate a Federal function to the States. (See S. Doc. No. 146, 61st Cong., 1st sess.)

These conclusions I regard as being in accord with the decisions of the Supreme Court and their logic to be unanswerable; in fact, they are axiomatic.

In Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Cook Brewing Co. (223 U. S.), decided on the 22d of January, 1912, and one of the latest deliverances on this subject, the Supreme Court says it is "indisputably determined"—

(a) That beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce.
(b) That it is not competent for any State to forbid any common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.
(c) That until such transportation is completed by delivery to the consignee such commodities do not become subject to State regulation restraining their sale or disposition.

The proponents of the present bill, H. R. 17593, endeavor to avoid these objections by calling upon Congress itself to regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors instead of asking it to surrender this regulation to the States at some point along the line of transit and before delivery. The earlier bills proposed may be characterized as merely negative or passive legislation by which the Federal power would withdraw from a field that it had formerly occupied. This bill, on the other hand, purports to be an affirmative and active exercise of the Federal power within the whole field of its constitutional operation.

I do not doubt the exclusive power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors as in other articles, up to and including the moment of delivery to the consignee. It would seem also to be clear that this regulation may, in appropriate cases, take the form of prohibition and exclusion from the channels of commerce; thus, by section 240 of the Criminal Code, the shipment of intoxicants not so marked as to plainly show the name of the consignee, the nature of its contents, and the quantity contained therein, is forbidden; and as also, under the food and drugs act, is the shipment of adulterated or misbranded liquors.

By this bill it is now sought to exclude from interstate commerce all liquors shipped with unlawful intent. This is asserted to be a rule propounded by Congress alone, which is uniform in character, and which, after the language of Gibbons against Ogden, regulates commerce in intoxicating liquors by prescribing a rule by which it shall be governed.

As against this, it is urged that when the unlawful intent is to be tested solely by the laws of various States which are or may be violated, these laws and not the law of Congress become ipso facto the determining factors; that since it would be unlawful, for instance, to ship intoxicating liquors into the State of Pennsylvania to be sold to a minor, into the State of Ohio to be sold on Sunday, into the State of Kentucky to be sold after closing hours, into the State of Oklahoma to be sold at all, the uniformity of the attempted rule at once disappears, and the laws of the States are given extraterritorial effect. Indeed, a shipment made with intent to sell might be legal when consigned to a license county and illegal when consigned to a no-license county, both in the same State.

The question, therefore, is not whether Congress can forbid the transportation, with unlawful intent, of intoxicating liquors, or any other commodity, but whether it can, without delegating or surrendering its constitutional power, adopt as the criterion, the test, of that unlawfulness a purpose to violate the law of any other sovereignty.

Now, it is all very well for gentlemen to rise on this floor or elsewhere and say that there is no doubt about the power of Congress to pass legislation of this character. There is doubt about it, and everybody knows it. And I observe that those who are most confident on the subject are usually those who have given it least thought. Confidence seems to exist in inverse ratio to the amount of study that has been actually bestowed. In this particular I commend the frankness of the chief advocate of a similar bill pending elsewhere, who says:

Now, I think no lawyer who is honest with himself and perfectly frank will deny that there are very close constitutional questions involved in this bill, and especially as to section 2.

It is indeed a close question, but it is perfectly clear to me that if this bill is to stand at all it must stand as a congressional declaration of a congressional policy and not as an attempt on the part of Congress to surrender or redelegate to the States the power which the States solemnly lodged in the Federal Government. Congress has no power to so amend or constrict the Constitution. For myself, I do not believe that this bill will give to the officers of the States engaged in enforcing State laws any powers which they do not now possess.

I am aware that some of the advocates of the bill contend that it will enlarge by indirection the power of the States over intoxicants in transit, and will render possible, under search and seizure laws, the entering of trains and other vehicles in which the forbidden liquors might be transported, either alone or in common with other legitimate articles of commerce; but this argument necessarily assumes that the bill is in fact, though not in language, a surrender or delegation of authority to the States which they have not heretofore enjoyed, and thus defeats its own purpose by exposing the bill to all the fatal objections which were urged against its predecessors.

But the bill, as I have said, professes to be an active exercise of congressional power. It is that or it is nothing. Congress is asked to declare that certain things shall not be done, and yet the gentlemen who say they favor such legislation want to stay our hands when we seek to punish those who do them. Is it not clear that if Congress has no right to punish it has no power to forbid; and, conversely, if it has the power to forbid, it is its duty to punish? Has it ever been seriously suggested before in the American Congress that we may create a crime but not punish it; that we shall have the will to denounce an offense but not the courage to punish the offender? [Applause.] What does the declaration by Congress that a certain thing shall not be done amount to if we go no further? What sanctity or sanction is there attached to a proclamation of that character? Is it any more than a resolution adopted by an assembly of worthy gentlemen to the effect that certain things do not meet with their approval? What are you going to do with a man who says, "I differ from you in your judgment, and I propose to continue to do this thing which you do not like"? How lame and impotent does that make the legislative branch of the Government appear? What a potent evasion of responsibility. What cowardice to say that Congress has the constitutional right to forbid a thing but not the constitutional courage to attach a penalty to its prohibition. [Applause.] Mr. Bishop, in the first volume of his work on "Criminal Law," section 6, says:

> By law, as the word is here used, is meant not merely the precept, but the penalty also. Indeed, law without punishment for its violation is in the nature of things impossible. It is as though we were to speak of an earth without matter, an atmosphere without air, an existence without existence.

The draftsman of this law recognized that principle. He knew that a law without sanctions and penalty was a mere all contracts made with reference to these shipments and not the declaration of legislative will; and therefore to this bill as originally presented he attached what he conceived to be appropriate penalties, by denouncing as null and void brutum fulmen, a mere declaration of legislative opinion and by depriving the article itself of its inherent property characteristics. I need not pause to discuss these suggested penalties, for it is enough to say that both friends and foes of the bill have united without dissent in striking them out as wholly impossible. The regulation of commerce by prohibiting the transportation of certain articles is no longer a novel exercise of congressional power. Laws are already on the statute books forbidding either entirely or on certain conditions the transportation of numerous articles, among them the following:

Slaves, explosives, lottery tickets; obscene books and other like articles; diseased and infected cattle; the mongoose, English sparrow, and other pests and game killed out of season; renovated or unstamped butter; unmarked or unlicensed virus and serum; gypsy moth, boll weevil, and insect pests; spuriously or falsely marked articles of gold and silver or their alloys; uninspected meats; adulterated and misbranded food and drugs; opium imported contrary to law; and, latest of all, the white slave traffic act.

To each of these laws Congress attached as a matter of course the sanction of a criminal penalty and imposed appropriate fines or imprisonments or both for their violation. Can any advocate of this bill assign a reason why a man should be punished for violating a law of Congress against the transportation of English sparrows and go free of punishment for the violation of a law of equal dignity forbidding the transportation of intoxicants for unlawful use?

If in violation of the revenue laws of the United States a man should sell intoxicating liquors at retail without having paid the special tax required by law, he may be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than 2 years, or both. Is there any reason why he should not suffer a similar penalty if, under this law, he knowingly ships intoxicating liquors for illicit use? Why should one law be given the sanction of criminal enforcement and the other left as an essay on the subject?

I insist that it is essential both to the validity and vitality of this proposed statute that either the penalties I suggest or some others shall be added thereto.

FEDERAL AID TO THE STATES.

Just one thing more, Mr. Speaker, which I feel it a solemn public duty to say. In the discussion of this bill the suggestion has been too frequently made that in some way the Federal Government is unfriendly to the States and is opposed to their enforcement of their own laws with reference to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. We hear talk about "partnership" between the Federal Government and the bootlegger, of the Federal Government "forcing intoxicating liquors on unwilling communities," and so on.

Oh, it is a very easy thing for local officers who, through indolence, inefficiency, or worse, do not want to execute local laws to unload the blame on the Federal Government or anybody else. It is quite natural, too, that such expressions should fall from the lips of those who make a business of appealing to passion rather than to reason and who wish to make their statements striking by the use of exaggerated language; but, unfortunately, this sort of talk is not confined to these classes; it comes from the lips of those who know better, and is not even a stranger in the halls of the Capitol itself.

I have no patience with it. It is not true in any sense, and those who indulge in it are helping to create a false impression in the public mind and stirring up animosities that may not be so easily laid.

The States or the people of the States created the Federal Government and gave it certain powers, which they can either take away or enlarge at pleasure; but they can not expect it to do things which they never gave it the power to do, and they ought not to be persuaded to look upon it as an enemy.

Congress has already declared that from the very instant when intoxicating liquors are delivered to the consignee they shall be subject to all the laws of the State in which they are delivered. It has further provided that no officer, agent, or employee of any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier shall deliver intoxicating liquors to any person other than the person to whom it has been consigned, or upon his written order, nor to any fictitious person or any person under a fictitious name. It has required all intoxicating liquors when shipped to be so labeled on the outside cover as to plainly show the name of the consignee, the nature of its contents, and the quantity contained therein. And it has forbidden any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier to collect the purchase price or to act in any way as the agent of the buyer or seller, thus putting an end to all C. O. D. shipments.

This is the law to-day. I do not believe the general public understand it. If they did, they would be less charitable toward those State officers who say they can not enforce State laws because the Federal law stands in the way.

But this is not all. A special tax is required to be paid to the United States by every person who desires to sell intoxicating liquors at retail, and while this is often spoken of as a "Government license," it is not, of course, a license in any sense, and gives to the party who pays the tax no right whatever to sell in violation of the law of the State. In fact, the law itself expressly provides that:

> The payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws for carrying on any trade or business shall not be held to exempt any person from any penalty or punishment provided by the laws of any State for carrying on the same within such State, or in any manner to authorize the commencement or continuance of such trade or business contrary to the laws of such State or in a place prohibited by municipal law; nor shall the payment of any such tax be held to prohibit any State from placing a duty or tax on the same trade or business for the State or other purposes.

In order to collect this tax the Federal Government keeps in the field its force of marshals, collectors, and secret-service agents making constant war on illicit distilleries and illegal sales. Its revenue collectors are required by law to keep publicly posted and to furnish to State authorities lists of those who have paid the special tax. The States have the right, and many of them exercise it, to make the payment of this special tax prima facie proof of an intent to violate the law; and thus this internal-revenue system instead of encouraging violation of State laws works in harmony with the State as its most effective aid.

In order to make this assistance as full as possible we have just reported favorably from the Judiciary Committee a bill directing the internal-revenue collectors to furnish upon request to the State officers not only a list of those who have paid this internal-revenue tax, but a certified copy of the application which is required to be made by the retailer to the internal-revenue collector's office.

All this, Mr. Speaker, demonstrates beyond question that instead of antagonism between the State and Federal Governments on this subject there is cooperation and active assistance.

For myself, I am willing to go as much further as we legally can along the line of this cooperation, but I do protest against the false and unfounded clamor that the Federal Government is blocking the moral progress of the States.

It was just this sort of thing which 50 years ago aroused human passion to a point where sober thought was no longer possible and drenched this land in blood. The Union was saved in vain if its citizens are to be taught now that it is a hateful and a foreign thing. The tears and blood that effort cost were a useless sacrifice if the system of government saved does not work as a harmonious whole. Instead of joining in such an outcry against it, will we not better serve the duty of the hour by raising our voices in its support. Must we not point out to the country that the State and Federal Governments are not hostile and contending forces but agents and servants of the same great people?

Above all, let us cause them to remember that no laws are automatic, and though we fill the shelves of all our libraries with new statutes on this and every other question, they will amount to nothing unless men are found who will enforce them. Now as always the first need the country over—in State, Nation, county, and city—is the genuine enforcement of the laws we have.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time has been consumed by those in advocacy of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama has 31 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from New Jersey has 49 minutes remaining.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in 10 minutes' time it is, of course, impossible to discuss this question from a legal standpoint, even if I was capable of discussing it. I want to refer to it, and I would be glad to have the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to modify that by including all gentlemen who have spoken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet to object, unless it included all gentlemen who have spoken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked, and unless a Member objects consent is given.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was on my feet to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, if I must object now, I will object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, after unanimous consent has been given to three Members within 20 minutes to extend their remarks, the gentleman from Alabama, exercising his power as a Member of the House, has objected to further unanimous consent, making fish of one and fowl of another, just as this proposed legislation will do in this country. [Applause.]

To make myself clear in the outset, I will say that I am not going to vote for this bill, but for many reasons I shall vote against it. I hold in my hand—and, as I have not unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I will read from—the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad against Cook Brewing Co., a very recent decision, reported in Two hundred and twenty-third United States, page 70. In my judgment that decision covers this matter. I read from that decision, as follows:

That beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce.

That it is not competent for any State to forbid any common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.

That until such transportation is concluded by delivery to the consignee, such commodities do not become subject to State regulation restraining their sale or disposition.

That is the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court, and yet we have this performance here to-day. Our power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations is the one power we have in the premises, all other power being reserved to the States. I take it that under the power to regulate commerce, even if it were possible for Congress to prohibit commerce in a given article that had been declared to be a legitimate article of commerce, yet Congress can not delegate its power to regulate interstate commerce to any State.

If this bill should be enacted into law, thereby establishing a precedent for legislation of this kind, where would it lead us? Let us hark back to the Civil War for a moment. The fugitive slave law was constitutionally enacted, but some States nullified that law and some communities set it at defiance. If at that time they could have invoked such a precedent as is sought to be established by the enactment of the pending bill, certainly the law might have been absolutely destroyed.

Let me take another illustration. There are in this country a great number of people affiliated with organized labor. I do not disparage organized labor. I agree that labor ought to organize, but always obeying the law and not interfering with the rights of others. Let us say that 2,000,000 voters belong to the ranks of organized labor, and suppose that Congress should enact legislation providing that an article produced in one State where there was no restriction as to hours of labor should not be the subject of interstate commerce in entering a State which had by law decreed that no article produced by labor working more than six hours or eight hours per day could enter its markets, that would place the regulation of interstate commerce absolutely in the respective States.

Odium theologicum! A proclamation from the pulpit; a cross proclamation from another pulpit. We have freedom and religious liberty in this country under the Constitution, and yet many of us have seen—I have time and again—such conditions and circumstances that if one State could control there would be but one church or one creed in that State.

Let me tell you what I think. In the various States there is any amount of law, but we lack enforcement; we lack a sound public sentiment which enforces the law. In many instances it is not enforced because it is against public sentiment. Nevertheless there is a disposition on the part of people who agitate, some from principle and some for a living, to demand more legislation. The mere abundance of law does not aid enforcement.

Mr. Speaker, for a number of years I was a prosecuting officer in the State of Illinois, and do you know I found that frequently in the attempt to enforce the antiliquor law the most active and ardent and apparently enthusiastic opponents of the liquor traffic were the hardest to get to testify. Many of them shouted in season and out of season, but when the time came to enforce the law they were found wanting. Frequently they would decline jury service, saying, "Oh, excuse me; I have not time," "It would hurt my business," and so forth. I have seen good men, scores of them, commit perjury touching the suppression of the liquor traffic.

I say again it is enforcement of the law that counts. Several years ago I went into the State of Maine. God bless the State of Maine. A splendid people live there. For 50 years they have had prohibition. The State has been "dry" for all that time; but what did I find? I found that, notwithstanding the prohibition feature of the constitution and laws of that State, public sentiment in the cities was such that a candidate for the office of sheriff—an officer charged with the duty of enforcing the law—was elected on a pledge of nonenforcement. I have campaigned somewhat in many States, but I tell you that liquor seemed to be more abundant, more accessible, and offered more freely in the State of Maine than in the wettest of the wet States.

My friend from North Carolina desires national legislation on this question. How many moonshiners are there in his State deliberately violating the revenue laws, pursuing their business in the nighttime, and aided by a lenient public sentiment and protected by perjury selling the illicit stuff?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, may I answer that question?

Mr. CANNON. In order to enforce the law it is necessary that there should be a public sentiment in favor of it. What is true of North Carolina is true everywhere. Yet the cry goes up for more law. The good prohibitionist, raising his hands to heaven, prays, "O God, inspire our legislators to give us more law"; but I am almost constrained to suspect that in some cases accompanying the prayer is the mental reservation "but I am agin its enforcement." [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. May I answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I can not yield in my 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, and I will again ask that along these lines, observing the rules of the House—and I think I know what the rules of the House are—I may be granted unanimous consent to briefly extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will enlarge that request so as to include all who have spoken.

Mr. CANNON. When this is granted, then I will enlarge the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the pending measure shall have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Within five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask as a substitute for that that all Members be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. Why not?

Mr. JAMES. Some gentlemen were given the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD a short time ago, and what is the objection to allowing the gentleman from Illinois the same right? He is the oldest Member on the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. LINTHICUM. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the request of the gentleman from Illinois that unanimous consent be granted to gentlemen who speak on the pending measure to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That applies alone to the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All gentlemen who speak.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have a substitute for that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's objection comes too late, the request having already been granted.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois shall be allowed five days in which to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon this question upon which he has just spoken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the gentleman from Illinois has already made that request for himself and others.

Mr. JAMES. No; and that is what I wanted to direct the attention of the Chair to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. JAMES. He did not include the others.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Chair has already announced that the request preferred by the gentleman from Illinois has been agreed to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so stated.

Mr. JAMES. That is all right.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been already granted.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey may consume some more of his time.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I have so many objections to the passage of this bill that even with my little ability it would be impossible for me to state them within the time that is given to me. In 1908 I was nominated by a Democratic primary in the State of Alabama, and in that primary the antisaloon league directed to each candidate the question as to whether or not each would vote for this legislation. I very promptly answered that if I became a Member of Congress from the second congressional district of Alabama I would not vote for any such legislation. [Applause.] I was nominated in the Democratic primary at that time, and was renominated and reelected twice since that time [applause], so, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I hold a commission from the people of the second congressional district of Alabama, "the cradle of the Confederacy and the cradle of home rule," to vote aganst any such proposition as this. [Applause.] I could not, in the little time that is given me, show the great objections that I have to this bill. It is the most peculiar and the most remarkable measure that I believe ever came from a great committee of the Congress of the United States. Why, Mr. Speaker, this bill declares that the transportation mentioned in the bill shall be prohibited. I shall not undertake to discuss the question as to whether or not the absence of a penalty makes the law absolutely nugatory. Is the Congress of the United States to declare a thing prohibited and then not fix a penalty for its violation? What does the law mean? Does it mean, Mr. Speaker, that the Congress of the United States relieves itself of the power which it has under the Federal instrument to regulate commerce between the States?

I notice that the title of the bill seems to indicate that its object is to divest intoxicating liquors of an interstate character in certain cases, and the bill says that they shall be prohibited. There might be some reason for contending that the Congress of the United States can delegate the power given it by the Constitution, to vest it in the States, but the title of this act declares one thing and the body of the act declares another. Every lawyer who has ever practiced criminal law knows that you can not make a crime by merely declaring it a crime. Every lawyer who has ever practiced in any court in this land knows that you can not by declaring a prohibition without adding a penalty make it a crime or an offense.

How would you enforce this act? I will ask that of the distinguished advocates of this bill. I repeat, How would you enforce this law, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, if it were adopted? There is, however, this insidious idea in the whole proposition, and gentlemen who want to vote for this bill ought to remember it: This bill makes it a prohibition on the part of the common carrier to accept a shipment of liquors. Now, suppose that the common carrier says that he will not accept it until it is decided whether or not he is violating the law. Then what? Every consignor and every consignee must go into the courts and ask for a writ of mandamus to compel the carrier to accept the shipment, and that notwithstanding the fact that in this bill you have no penalty whatever for a violation of the law. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not time to go further into this discussion, but I do want to say——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I do want to say that I am deeply regretful that the States of the South—and I come from the cradle of the Confederacy—should be willing to ask the Federal Government to aid them in enforcing their domestic regulations. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, we do not come with this measure and ask the Federal Congress to enforce the laws of any of the States of this Union. That is not the object of the bill. The object of this measure is to establish the right and the power for each State to enforce its own temperance laws in whatever form they may be enacted by the different States. The States should have this right. It belongs to State rights, to the sovereignty of the States, to control in these affairs, and the States could exercise that right and power but for the fact that the Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall regulate interstate commerce.

But for that utterance in the Constitution and for that fixing of the power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress, the States could regulate this matter, and all that the friends of this measure ask and contend for is that the hand of the Federal Government by act of Congress shall be lifted from this interstate commerce and let the States in their sovereign capacity and in the exercise of their State rights enact laws and enforce those laws as best they can. I admit there is great difficulty in enforcing laws upon this subject. We have all seen that. And I want to say right here and now that the penal clause suggested by my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] would perhaps give more force and vitality to the suppression of the illegal traffic of liquor, and especially to the enforcement of this law, but when he did that it would carry into the domain of the Federal court the enforcement of the prohibition laws of every State in the Union.

And that is exactly what we do not want to do. We do not ask the Federal Government to come and enforce the laws of Tennessee or any other State. We only ask that the hands of the Federal Government shall be lifted so that the State can exercise its own right and have the proper power to enact and carry out its own laws. You know very well if that penal clause were inserted in this bill, forthwith the enforcement of this law would go to the Federal courts. We would have the Federal Government interfering in matters that had best be left to the State. And I know the States experience great difficulty in enforcing this, but give them the benefit of this aid, this power, to do all they can in regulating this illegal traffic. Then, we believe, the question could be solved in the best and most legitimate way in which to solve this question.

Now, then, much has been said in regard to the personal-use clause. There is no occasion for the insertion of that clause in this bill, because the bill does not interfere with personal use. It does not deal with that. It deals only with one proposition, and that is that inoxicating liquors of every kind shall not be shipped into any State when they are shipped for the purpose of violating the law of that State.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. Here is what Senator Knox said with reference to the personal-use clause:

Congressional expression in favor of personal use would be an expression upon a subject with which Congress has nothing to do, and upon it all sorts of confusing questions would arise. The same evidence required to defeat the claim of importation for personal use would give the State the right to follow up and seize the goods under any existing State law covering the subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is exactly right, Mr. Speaker, and I agree with that doctrine fully. We do not ask Congress to deal with questions of that kind. The bill does not deal with a question of that kind. It only proposes to prohibit the shipment of intoxicating liquors into any State when said liquor is intended to be used in violation of the laws of that State. It would not interfere with the shipping of any liquors into any States that were intended to be used in compliance with the laws of that State. The States have not prohibited the personal use of liquor or the right to possess liquor, but many of the States have passed laws prohibiting its sale and manufacture. If a State in its sovereign capacity determines to enact laws to suppress the sale of whisky, it is a question for that State's own determination, and the State should have full opportunity and power to enforce its own regulations upon this question; and if Congress has the power to lift a barrier in the way of the States enforcing their own law, Congress should certainly do that thing. By refusing to do this Congress is aiding and abetting the illegal traffic of this article and is furnishing the means of nullifying the law of the State and promoting the illegal sales that have been so much decried by gentlemen on this floor in discussing this measure.

The passage of this law furnishes the opportunity for the States to control in this matter, or at least will aid in State control and in home rule. It is but aiding local option, with the State as the unit, and I think that all agree that the control of the liquor traffic belongs to the States and that the State in its exercise of its police power in local self-government should be aided as much as it is possible for Congress to aid it.

We all know that laws prohibiting the sale of whisky are difficult to enforce. We know that there has been and there will be in the future the "blind tiger," the "bootlegger" and the moonshiner. No law is enforced perfectly, much less a law of this character, yet we must realize that the more difficult it is to obtain liquor, the less will be obtained; the more difficult it is for the "blind tiger" to get supplies, the less he will get. And this is the class of offenders, these men who sell whisky in soft-drink establishments and other clandestine ways, which will be interfered with; and much can be done toward suppressing them when you place it out of their power to get their supplies shipped to them from another State, and I think this is the greatest good that will come from this measure. It will enable the State, by the exercise of its police power to enact laws, if they have not such laws, by which they can make it impossible or very difficult for this class of offenders to ply their illegal traffic.

As to the constitutionality of this measure, none of the decisions referred to go to the extent of holding that the provisions of this bill are unconstitutional. I can not understand why, when Congress is given the power by the Constitution to regulate interstate commerce, and the control thus being in Congress, that Congress can not by enactment give power to the States to deal with an outlawed article of commerce when carried into the States. When Congress says that liquor intended to be used in violation of law shall not be transported, then such liquor is no longer an article of interstate commerce and is out of the domain of interstate commerce, and the States can deal with it.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said in this discussion about this measure being futile and ineffective. If so, why such determined opposition to it by those representing the liquor organizations of the land? It may not accomplish the good that its supporters desire, but it is a step in the direction of aiding the States to enforce their laws to suppress the illegal sale of liquor, and I give my hearty support to a measure for that purpose. This measure has been berated as a "flimflam" measure and its supporters as being demagogues and hypocrites. This argument is unworthy of dignified reply and unworthy of the men who make it on this floor. They assume to themselves all virtue and all the candor and courage of conviction. Mr. Speaker, any cause may have the support of some demagogues and hypocrites, and it is quite as possible that this bill may have the opposition of some who are equally insincere and lacking in moral courage.

Whether a man believes in prohibition or not he should support this measure because it only gives the States the power more perfectly, more fully, more amply to enforce its laws. Whether you agree to the wisdom of a State passing prohibitory laws, every believer in American institutions and our theory of government should be willing to let each State determine that question for itself and aid the State in carrying out local government and home rule, and I have expressed the sentiment before on the floor of this House, that to say we can not enforce a law that meets the approval of the enlightened judgment and conscience of the people, who, through their Representatives, enacted these laws, is contrary to the spirit of the fathers who laid the foundations of this Government and who believed that the people were capable of self-government and would be able to enforce the laws that their wisdom and judgment approved.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time each side has consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has 26 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] 32 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I have noticed many remarkable things here to-day. At one moment the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] opposed the bill with great earnestness, in the firm belief that it would interfere completely with the shipment of alcoholic beverages into dry territory for individual use, as heretofore, and then a few moments later the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] was equally as earnest and even more certain that unless his amendment was adopted the same measure would have no effect whatsoever upon these shipments. Which of them is correct?

Another remarkable thing is the repeated announcement by the opponents of this bill that prohibition does not prohibit; that there is a greater consumption of alcoholic beverages in dry territory than wet territory; and yet they spoke in the interest of great brewers and great distillers whose sole object in life is to increase the consumption of their products. It is very remarkable that such a stupendous effort should be made on the part of these interests to defeat this measure if the result would be to increase the consumption of their goods. It is equally remarkable to hear rational men propound the self-evident contradictory theory that drinking beer reduces the drinking of distilled spirits. As a matter of fact, the vast bulk of all liquor drinking originated in the drinking of beer and other fermented drinks. It seems extraordinary to hear men on this floor plead for personal liberty as spokesmen of an agent that undermines the moral fiber of the Nation, lowers its average standard of character, and overthrows the foundation of all liberty. It is particularly singular to hear discourses in the interest of law observance from those who are the agents of those who are the source of most of the lawlessness of the land. It is singular to hear Members pleading for the sanctity of the home when the agent for whom they plead is the greatest enemy of the home. But the most remarkable thing of all is the gusto with which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] announced that he could get liquor in unusual abundance and with unusual ease in the dry State of Maine, and to hear colleagues of his applaud and rejoice at this grewsome fact—the violation of the laws of a great State.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, prohibition does prohibit, though it does not stop drinking. In the State of Maine the collections of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are only about one-ninth of what they would be if Maine furnished its pro rata share of the internal revenue when prorated according to population. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] could find in Bangor, Portland, and other cities this one-ninth, but the great traffic has been blighted in that State. Upon the same proportion the State of Kansas ought to supply eleven times as much as it actually supplies. The State of Oklahoma ought to supply nineteen times as much as it actually does supply, and the State of North Dakota ought to supply twenty-nine times as much as it does actually supply. But, Mr. Speaker, it is a source not only of astonishment, but of sadness, that the violation of law that does go on in dry territory should be the source of jest and delight on the part of good citizens from any party or any section. It is impossible to escape the fact that the liquor interests who are opposing this measure are themselves the source of the very existence and continuance of all the blind tigers, bootleggers, and various others who violate the law in dry territory. No further argument is needed than the spectacle we have had for months and months where the stupendous interests representing the liquor business of two and one-half billions annually have been moving heaven and earth in trying to reserve to themselves the profits that accrue to them from the violation of their country's laws. However, there should be no surprise on the part of those who have investigated the real nature of alcohol and its effect upon the individual and upon society. I do not wish to split hairs about the Constitution.

No one can doubt the complete power of the individual State for the exercise of its police power to control its commodities within its borders. This bill does not add to that power, but simply makes it more effective, and it does not surrender any interstate right over any commodity. But in the light of the nature of alcohol the general-welfare clause in the Constitution would be eminently applicable. I do not believe there is a gentleman on the floor who would question the statement that liquor drinking is a menace to the general welfare of any community in which it operates. In fact, deep beneath all other rights is the right of self-preservation. The community has this right, the State has this right, the United States has this right, and anything that threatens the perpetuity of the existence of any one of these political entities must be assumed to be contained in the rights of the community to succeed to their suppression.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this question is no longer open to argument. Alcohol as to its real nature has been proven to be a poison and has been so proven by scientific investigations. As the poison in diphtheria comes from the toxin or excretion of the diphtheria bacillus, so the poison in alcohol comes from the toxin or excretion of the yeast or ferment germ. Alcohol is thus a toxin and as such comes within the family of toxic poisons. The universal law of biology is that the toxin of one form of life is a poison to all forms of a higher order. The yeast germ is killed by the alcohol it produces when it reaches 12 per cent concentrate. It is a single-cell germ and is below all organisms and is below most of the plants, so that it is a poison to everything that is protoplasmic. Oxides of the hydrocarbons, belladonna, morphia, strychnia, and other drugs have what is called an affinity for a particular tissue. While they attack all tissues, the attack is more deadly on a particular one. In the case of strychnine, the affinity is for the spinal cord, and people die from strychnine as from convulsions. Alcohol has been found to have an affinity of the cells that are in line with evolution. In the case of a plant, alcohol will cause the line of its development to be checked, and even reversed, and brings the plant back to its wild state. The Indian will want his tomahawk; the black man will be put back from his state of civilization to a state of savagery, and the white man will be degenerated in a similar degree and is reduced to a state of semi-civilization and finally down toward the brute.

This is readily understood when it is realized that alcohol is absorbed in the nerves and attacks the nerve tissue proper, and that the line of evolution of man is the nervous system, and alcohol attacks the nerve itself. The part of the nervous system most in line is the gray matter on the surface of the convolutions in the part of the brain called the cerebrum, where are found to be the seat of the centers of inhibition. It is the seat of the moral sense; here self-control is exercised in keeping with the conception of right and wrong and of duty. These cells are rapidly degenerated and are in the end actually wiped out through the process of degeneracy.

An insight into this widespread degeneracy can be understood when it is realized that there are about 3,000 murders each year where men actually murder their own wives and about 2,500 where they kill their own children and about 16,000 cases where they desert their little children. Doing violence to natural instincts, committing deeds that an animal would not be guilty of, this creature man, just a little lower than the angels, in the image of his Maker, has thus degenerated until he ends in actually being below the brute. Mr. Speaker, our character is the line of human evolution, and alcohol is a specific for degeneracy, the tearing down of character. The institutions of progress, of liberty, must be founded upon the average standard of character of the Nation. The widespread dissemination of this specific for degeneracy is producing already a large degenerate vote. Having no centers of inhibition, no sense of patriotism behind them, these votes are bought and sold by political machinery, and through them sinister interests are wont to attack the people through franchises and monopolies and are able to control elections.

If the degenerate votes continue to multiply, sinister interests will soon control the legislative and judicial branches of our Government and liberty will be undermined and our Constitution will perish. In vain can we appeal to our Constitution if the average standard of character of our people is thus undermined. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Nation's very existence is at stake in checking and ultimately destroying this great evil. Nature is helpless before degeneracy. When degeneracy begins then nature undertakes to exterminate it. It is true she uses natural agencies, but they are only the more effective because slow and accumulative. In the case of every drinking man, alcohol makes an attack upon the tissues of his body. The man does not realize how it is attacking the tissues, because it has already attacked the nerves and no message of pain is sent to the brain. The tissue under operation, as it were, is under anæsthesia. Alcohol is its own anæsthetic and deadens the pain it would otherwise produce, the pain being felt chiefly when the victim comes out from under the anæsthetic, and then he seeks to be relieved of the pain and to go back under the anæsthetic. Alcohol coursing through the veins and tissues partially paralyzes the white blood corpuscles that must destroy disease germs in order to produce health and life.

This army of defense can not meet the enemy invading when it is paralyzed. Figures go to show that the death rate for the population at large is 1,000 deaths per year out of every 61,215 of the population and that the death rate of total abstainers is 560 per cent out of the same number, and for liquor dealers, 1,642 deaths per year out of the same number. These figures resulting from many millions of cases can be taken as accurate. They show that 440 deaths out of every 1,000 deaths, nearly one-half the deaths that occur, are due to alcohol. Applied to this country, over 680,000 deaths per year in continental United States, or over 725,000 per year in the United States and its possessions. In other words, alcohol is killing out people at the rate of nearly 2,000 men a day every day in the year.

The Army War College at Washington made an investigation of the destructiveness of war. Taking all the wars of the world, from the Russo-Japanese War back to 500 B. C., the War College found that the total number of killed and wounded in battle amounts to about 2,800,000, of which it is estimated that about 700,000 were killed and something over 2,000,000 wounded.

The comparative figures show the appalling fact that alcohol is killing off as many Americans every year as all the wars of the world have killed in battle in 2,300 years.

Applied to the whole white race, we find that alcohol is killing 3,500,000 white men every year, five times as many as have been killed in war in 2,300 years; so that, stated mathematically, alcohol is 10,000 times more destructive than all wars combined. No wonder the Governments investigating the subject have found that war has been only a secondary cause of national decline, and that alcohol has been the real destroyer that has overthrown all the great nations of the past and is now undermining the great nations of to-day.

The figures of the British Government and English life insurance companies as to the effect of drinking on longevity are stated as follows:

If a young man at the age of 20 is a total abstainer and remains a total abstainer, his prospect of life is 44 years, and he will live to the average age of 64; but if he is a temperate regular drinker his prospect of life will be 31 years, and he will live to the average age of 51, after losing 13 years out of his life. If he is a heavy drinker, his prospect of life is 15 years, and he will die at the average age of 35, after losing 29 years out of his life. Conservative estimates place the number of confirmed drunkards in the United States at something over 1,000,000, of whom 300,000 die every year; the heavy drinkers at over 4,000,000; and temperate regular drinkers at over 20,000,000. A soldier wounded in battle and losing 10 years of his life as a consequence would be classed as seriously wounded. The confirmed drunkards and heavy drinkers together, 5,000,000 in number, must be looked upon as mortally wounded and the temperate regular drinkers as seriously wounded, making a total of over 25,000,000 Americans wounded by alcohol to-day—more than ten times as many as wounded in all the battles of the world since the dawn of history. The estimates for the white race make over 125,000,000 white men to-day wounded by alcohol.

If a great military power were to declare war on unprepared America to-day, every patriotic heart would be filled with anxiety. I know the full significance of war, especially when a nation is unprepared. But if I had the choice of having alcohol continue its deadly ravages with the Nation at peace or of having it wiped off the face of the land with a declaration of war by all the nations of the earth, I would not hesitate for a moment; I would take sober, undegenerate America and face the combined world in arms.

Dr. Demme says that if children are divided into two groups, those born of total abstainers and those born of drinkers, that five times as many will die among those in the second group than from an equal number of the first group. If this is true, and Dr. Demme says it is, as a scientific man, then there are 200,000 deaths of little children every year from wounds inflicted upon them before they are born. This is readily understood from experiments at Cornell, that show that the human embryo is exceedingly sensitive to alcohol. The figures show that one-tenth of 1 per cent, or 1 part out of 1,000 parts, attacks this embryo and erodes it so that if it should live it would never be normal, while a solution of one-half or 1 per cent, 1 part in 200 parts—as a matter of fact, only a very small solution—of alcohol will kill the human embryo. The form that the erosion takes can be readily discerned from the lives of those who survive. Taking the two extreme cases, if both parents are alcoholic, one child in five becomes incurable and one child in three becomes epileptic.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] to occupy some of his time now.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, Judge BRANTLEY. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I decline to discuss the question of prohibition or the evils of intemperance, because I decline to recognize the power of Congress to legislate on these subjects for the several States. [Applause.] These are matters for the police power of the State and not for Congress.

I want to submit a few objections to the pending bill based on constitutional lines. The remarkable character of the legislation proposed will be disclosed if we consider for a moment what the effect would be if we added to it the penal clause that has been suggested. This bill prohibits the "shipment or transportation" in interstate commerce of liquors under certain conditions. If we add a penal clause, what would the law be? The Supreme Court long ago held that—laws which create crimes ought to be so explicit that all men subject to their penalties may know what acts it is their duty to avoid. (139 U. S., 288.)

And again:

Every man should be able to know with certainty when he is committing a crime. (92 U. S., 214.)

The language of the pending bill is:

That the shipment or transportation * * * of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind from one State * * * into any State * * * which said * * * liquor is intended by any person interested therein to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State * * * is hereby prohibited.

The thing prohibited is the shipment and the transportation. A penal clause would punish the shipper and the transportation company for shipping or transporting, and yet neither the shipper nor the transportation company could read the law and know what acts should be avoided to make the transaction legal; and neither one could possibly know with certainty or otherwise when he was violating the law. With a penal clause added to the bill, we would have, should the bill become a law, a penal statute embracing by reference and without description the laws of all the States and punishing one man for the bare intention, and it undisclosed, of some other man to violate some one of these undescribed laws.

No man could know when he was violating the law, and such a law would be in the teeth of the sixth amendment to the Constitution. The friends of the measure did well to omit the penal clause, but they did not thereby save the constitutionality of the bill. It is true that no penalty, in the technical sense of that term, is imposed by the bill for a violation of its terms, but the entire bill is simply a penalty. It is nothing but a penalty, for the only thing it does is to penalize the shipper and the transportation company by denying to them the right under certain conditions to engage in interstate commerce. The right to engage in interstate commerce is a constitutional right, guaranteed to every citizen, and yet this bill proposes to deny to the shipper the right to ship his goods in interstate commerce and to the transportation company the right to transport them because some man in some other State unknown to either of them has an undisclosed intention to violate a State law in connection with the goods being shipped or transported. The punishment inflicted is not upon the man who has the intention to violate the law, but upon the innocent man, the man guiltless of either act or intention in violation of any law.

I do not care what the purpose of those framing this legislation may be declared to be, I take their bill as they have written it and I find that by its very letter the thing it does and the only thing it does is to take from certain of our citizens their constitutional right to engage in interstate commerce because of the undisclosed intentions of certain other of our citizens. For my own part, I can not stand for that kind of legislation. [Applause.]

It would be a travesty upon law to call this a regulation of commerce. It is not a regulation but a prohibition of commerce and a prohibition that can not be defended upon any known principle of law. The power of Congress to regulate commerce is a power uniformly and universally held to be limited to such regulations as are reasonable in character.

Can any man say that a regulation of commerce is reasonable in character when it lays down as the condition upon which the right of interstate commerce can be enjoyed that the shipper must know the police laws of all the States and, in addition, must know the unuttered thoughts with reference to these laws of people he has never seen? The same reasoning and the same justice that would make void a penal law of that indefinite and uncertain character will surely make void also the same law enacted in the guise of a regulation of commerce.

The recent act of Congress requiring liquors shipped in interstate commerce to be plainly marked as liquors is a regulation of commerce easily understood and easily complied with, but not so the so-called regulation in the pending bill. The one is a reasonable regulation, the other an unreasonble one.

Mr. Speaker, while sympathizing heartily with the purpose of the promoters of this particular legislation, so far as that purpose may be to produce temperance and morality in this country, I am opposed to this particular legislation because it is not only unreasonable but is also a direct invasion of State sovereignty.

Let me lay down this proposition: The police power of a State is entirely separate and apart from the power of Congress under the commerce clause. The right of the State to enact police regulations is an exclusive right. The right of Congress to regulate commerce is also an exclusive right. Neither sovereignty can infringe upon the jurisdiction of the other. It is true that we sometimes have difficulty in knowing just where the right or power of one sovereignty ends and the power of the other begins. We have been told about a "twilight zone"; but, so far as the regulation of the sale of liquor is concerned, all are agreed that it comes within the police power of the States and that Congress has no jurisdiction and no power over it. I ask my friends if they would maintain as valid a law of Congress undertaking to regulate the sale of liquor in the different States of this country? I dare say they would say no. I ask them, then, if Congress has the power to adopt the police regulations of the States and make them laws of Congress? Are not the two propositions one and the same? We know that when Congress adopts the law of a State the law when adopted becomes effective not because the State enacted it but because Congress enacted it. It is said that this bill is a regulation of commerce by Congress. I deny it. If this bill becomes a law and no State shall enact legislation of any kind, what would be your regulation? None. There is no regulation unless the State acts, and the regulation that is effective is the regulation of the State and not of Congress.

Now, if Congress can not enact police regulations for the States, it can not adopt such regulations when enacted by the States. It can not adopt a part of them. If it can adopt a part, it can adopt all. The thing that is made unlawful in this bill is the intent to violate a State law. The bill is the adoption by Congress of a part of the police regulations of a State. The State law must exist before the intent to violate it can exist. Under this bill Congress enters upon the domain of State legislation. There is no principle better settled than that Congress can not do this. Section 3243 of the Revised Statutes distinctly says that the payment of an internal-revenue tax shall not be held—in any manner to authorize the commencement or continuance of such trade or business contrary to the laws of such State.

The Supreme Court in Fifth Wallace, page 471, in speaking of the domestic or internal trade of a State, said:

Over this commerce and trade Congress has no power of regulation nor any direct control.

In Judge Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 574, the author says:

In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government.

In Seventy-sixth United States, page 42, the Supreme Court held the act of March 2, 1867, making it a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment to mix for sale certain oils of less than a certain temperature to be void, because, in fact, nothing more than a police regulation relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States. The Supreme Court said:

That Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes the Constitution expressly declares. But this express grant of power to regulate commerce among the States has always been understood as limited by its terms, and as a virtual denial of any power to interfere with the internal trade and business of the separate States except, indeed, as a necessary and proper means for carrying into execution some other power expressly granted or vested.

Despite the fundamental principle thus set forth in statute and judicial opinion that Congress can not enact police regulations, here is a bill that proposes, if it proposes anything, that Congress shall enact by adoption certain of the police regulations of the States, by which regulations interstate commerce shall be variously regulated in the different States.

I submit that this can not be done. But, Mr. Speaker, if it could be done—if Congress has any such power—I would, as a friend of State sovereignty, shrink from its exercise in the way proposed, because if we concede that Congress may enter the domain of State sovereignty for the purpose of prohibiting the sale of liquor, we must concede, further, that Congress can also so enter for the purpose of permitting the sale of liquor. If Congress has jurisdiction at all, its jurisdiction is as complete to permit as it is to prohibit.

But, going a step farther, this bill is an invasion of State sovereignty because it is the exalting of the sovereignty of one State by degrading the sovereignty of another State. [Applause.] The States are equal in sovereignty, and neither one is supreme or superior to another. If this bill becomes a law there will be one State where under the Constitution a contract will be made—a valid legal contract—to purchase and deliver intoxicating liquors and ship them in interstate commerce; yet another State, with no greater sovereignty, will be permitted to annul that contract and prevent its enforcement because Congress has adopted the law of the State that contains the prohibition.

Mr. WEBB. May I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I have but a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I have no time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BRANTLEY. We would thus, by this legislation, bring about a conflict that I do not know how you would settle nor how it would be settled. One sovereign State would demand the right to have its valid contracts enforced and another State would demand the right to prevent their enforcement and deny the sovereignty of the other State to sanction the contract. It was to avoid that very situation that our Constitution was framed and that the commerce clause was put into the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, this legislation would not only be invalid if enacted, but it would accomplish no results, because in the end, if it could be enforced at all, it would have to be enforced by the same machinery that is now in existence, and which our friends tell us now fails to enforce the laws we already have. [Applause.]

Not only does the bill fail to include any provision for its enforcement, but being based solely on an intent and an intent that must exist in advance of any act or attempt toward carrying it into effect, how can the law be enforced? How can such an intent be proven? The law must fail because of no judicial power to ascertain the existence of or to decree against such an intent.

The friends of the measure seem to have the idea that the States will enforce the law by denying the admission into their territory of certain liquors. But can that be possible?

No State will have any greater power after the passage of this bill than it had before. The States can not now, nor can they after the passage of this bill, regulate interstate commerce. This is so, not because of the will of Congress but because of the command of the Constitution.

After the passage of this bill, as now, an interstate shipment must be allowed to proceed to delivery to the consignee, for it is so written in the Constitution and so construed by the Supreme Court.

Neither the right to interstate commerce nor the interstate-commerce character of any lawful article of commerce can be determined or denied by the police regulation of any State. The protection that an interstate shipment of liquor has until delivery to the consignee is a protection granted by the Constitution, and it is as much beyond the power of Congress to alter or repeal the Constitution as it is beyond the power of the State so to do. A legitimate article of commerce will not and can not cease to be such because of an intent in the mind of some man to use it in some way in violation of a State police regulation. Its interstate-commerce character can not be tested by any such rule, for to permit such a rule would be to repeal the commerce clause of the Constitution and to transfer from Congress to the States the power to regulate interstate commerce.

This bill is but the old Hepburn-Dolliver and the old Littlefield bills stated in another way. In those and similar bills Congress has been asked for several years to say that if any State so willed interstate commerce should cease to be interstate commerce when it reached the boundary line of such State. Congress was asked in those bills to say in terms that the police power of the State should attach to intoxicating liquors the moment they entered the State. There was no question here as to what the promoters of this class of legislation sought. They were open and candid in their demands, and in terms they asked that the regulating power of Congress over commerce be subordinated to the police power of the State. In the pending bill they are not so open and candid. They say now they are asking a regulation by Congress. But are they? The regulation sought is a regulation in name only, so far as Congress is concerned. They seek now, as before, to subordinate the power of Congress to the power of the State. They would have Congress adopt the police regulations of the State, and then permit the State to enforce these regulations as applied to interstate commerce. The thing sought now is identically the thing that was sought before. The end to be reached, to wit, State control of interstate commerce in liquors, is the same now as it was before.

Congress has heretofore in its wisdom denied the appeals for such legislation because beyond the power of Congress to grant. Congress has no greater power now than it has heretofore had.

Gentlemen, in their advocacy of this measure, fail to tell us that the States in the exercise of their police power have never sought to go further in dealing with intoxicating liquors than to prohibit their sale. The personal use, consumption, and possession of liquors has not been interdicted. Intoxicating liquors have not in and of themselves been legislatively declared to be detrimental to the health, peace, or morality of any State. The thing that has been condemned is the selling of them. It has been the business of the dealer and not the consumption by the individual that has been condemned. So far as the sale of liquors is concerned, the power of the States is now ample to control and prohibit it.

The supreme power over the sale now vests in the State. There is no State in the Union where intoxicating liquors, no matter from where they come, can be lawfully sold except in obedience to the laws of such State. If in any State liquors are to-day being unlawfully sold, it is because the officials of such State are failing to do their duty. If it is the purpose of gentlemen advocating this legislation to prevent the use and consumption of liquors, they are appealing to the wrong sovereignty. The place to go is the legislatures of their respective States. Congress has no power for that purpose, and I might say that it will be time enough to ask Congress to deny the right of interstate commerce to all liquors when the States have outlawed their use, consumption, and possession.

In 1890 Congress enacted the Wilson law, which is now of force. This law provides that—

> * * * Intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

This reads very much like what is now being proposed in the way of legislation. The language of the present law "upon arrival in such State" is broad enough to cover a shipment the moment it crosses the State line, for at that point it has "arrived in such State," but the Supreme Court held that these words meant and necessarily meant arrival at place of destination and delivery to the consignee, for until that time the shipment constitutes interstate commerce, control over which Congress could not delegate to the States. This law and the repeated adjudications of the Supreme Court thereon foreclosures the subject with me. I shall stand upon the Constitution as the fathers wrote it and as the courts have expounded it.

Congress has already legislated in so far as it can do so to enable the States to control all sales of all liquors being or coming within their respective domains, and the power of the States in that regard is full and complete. Congress has gone further than mere sales of liquor, for in the law just quoted it has declared that, no matter from where liquors come, when they reach the consignee their use, consumption, or storage, as well as their sale, shall be subject to the police power of the State. Under the Constitution a man is entitled to ship and to receive liquors in interstate commerce, but after receiving them he holds them subject to the police power of his State, and can make no lawful use of them save in compliance with the laws of his State.

Mr. Speaker, to my way of thinking there is abroad in our country what seems to me a most dangerous sentiment. For my own part I am not concerned as to what the courts may do with this bill if it becomes a law, but I am concerned as to what I do with it under my oath of office. [Applause.]

The sentiment abroad, and which I regard as the most dangerous to-day in our Republic, is the sentiment that there are no guardians and no keepers of the Constitution save the judges of the courts of our land, and that if public sentiment seems to demand certain legislation Congress must enact it and leave to the courts to say whether or not it complies with the Constitution.

When I realize and know that there to-day exists no more obligation upon the part of the Chief Justice or any of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court to uphold the Constitution than has been incurred by me, because the same oath to support the Constitution they have taken I have taken, I refuse to subscribe to the proposition that I must abdicate my power and my duty as a legislator of first passing upon constitutional questions.

Mr. Speaker, if this tendency or this sentiment persists, what must be the result in the end? If it persists, one of two things must happen. Either the courts must abdicate their duty and violate their obligations or else some day the people, led by the criminal indifference and cowardice of their legislators to believe themselves an outraged people, will rise up and hurl the courts from power, and in either event constitutional government will be gone. [Applause.]

I believe that important as it may be and important as it is to enforce prohibition or temperance, important as it is to have enacted this reform and that reform, I believe it is more important to each and all of us to preserve the Constitution under which we live. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey has 18 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama 21 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would not trespass upon the patience of the House this morning to discuss this measure, as my attitude is well known, if it had not been that my colleague from the other side of the aisle [Mr. BARTHOLDT] undertook to speak for the people of that great Commonwealth lying just west of the Mississippi in which he and I live. I challenge his statement that he speaks in behalf of the majority of the people of Missouri. I say to him that I and those who cooperate with me speak for the liberty-loving, home-loving, law-abiding, righteous, moral element of the people of that great State. [Applause.] He speaks, as he has often spoken, in behalf of those in his district and elsewhere who have accumulated vast fortunes, aggregating many millions of dollars, built upon the wrecked homes of thousands of good people throughout this land. I speak for those whose homes have been devastated, whose manhood has been corrupted, whose happiness has been destroyed, whose rights have been trampled under foot by those he speaks for.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it not true that two years ago the people of the gentleman's State and my State voted——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; it is true.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But I have not yet finished my question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I know what the gentleman is going to ask, and, in reply, I answer, the question then involved was State-wide prohibition, not local option; but, may I say, I have reason to believe and do believe that those you speak for imported cheap voters from other States in order to secure a majority against State prohibition in Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Oh, the gentleman knows that is not true, and a Democratic legislature has admitted that it is not true, and officials appointed by the governor have admitted that it is not true, but Missouri by a majority of 217,000 votes defeated prohibition.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to discuss that matter, as it is in nowise involved here, but I will say that just after that election sadness was depicted in the faces of some of my good friends across the aisle who lost votes enough in their districts to enable the people to send Democrats in their places, because those represented by my esteemed colleague [Mr. BARTHOLDT] brought in every voter they could from far and near to vote against prohibition in Missouri, and I think the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Oh, there is not one word of truth in that.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I say there is.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the other gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. At any time and in any place.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will, but make your question short.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Just a word. The legislature appointed a committee to investigate that condition of affairs. That committee was Democratic in its majority and it reported that there was no importation of voters from outside.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I can not yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman provokes me to say that from one disreputable house in St. Louis there were voted several hundred alleged voters who did not live in St. Louis.

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, I am not going to further discuss that matter with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to say, in conclusion, that I am glad that the Congress of the United States, in response to a demand widespread and intelligent, not fanatical, as some gentlemen have denounced it, but a moral sentiment which comes from ocean to ocean, is to-day responding to that appeal and by an overwhelming vote will send this bill to the other end of the Capitol for its enactment into law.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that the passage of this bill may dissolve the Union and destroy the Constitution. Let me appeal to those gentlemen who are afraid the Constitution is going to be wrecked because we say to dealers in liquor that they can not ship their goods into States where its sale is prohibited by law, to be sold in violation of local law, to be of good cheer. The Constitution does not depend upon a whisky bottle for its perpetuity and its safety. It rests upon and depends upon——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I was just getting to the interesting point in my speech, but I yield.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to-day to the arguments made for and against the passage of this bill. They are made by lawyers, principally upon its constitutionality, and from the wide difference of opinion that is manifest, I am reminded of what President Taft once stated, that great constitutional lawyers are those that have given up the practice of law and gone into politics.

Being a business man, I prefer to speak from a business standpoint, because I believe the passage of such a law as this would interfere very materially with the business and commercial welfare of the country. I have very grave doubts about the bill doing what is intended by it, and do not hesitate to say that I believe there will be liquor, and lots of it, sold in the States that you are now legislating to keep it out of, after the law is passed. I am not much of a prohibitionist when it comes to passing legislation of this kind. I have never been in any section of the country where prohibition prohibits, because it is hard to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors when public sentiment is against it. I am not reflecting on those who advocate prohibition, nor am I finding fault with those who condemn liquor because of its ill effects. If one-half the effort were made to regulate the sale of liquor that is made to prohibit its use, we would accomplish more of a benefit to humanity.

The business world to-day is doing more for the cause of temperance than many of the reformers. It is fast becoming apparent that men who drink to excess can not occupy places of responsibility or trust in the commercial or industrial world. I doubt whether anybody who has given serious thought to the subject will contend that you can regulate men's appetites by law. You hear a great deal about dry territory. Where is it? I have been in many of the so-called dry States, but never was in one where you could not get as much whisky as you wanted to pay for. I do not believe there is any dry territory, and there are many here more certain of that fact than I am.

I feel sorry for men who have formed an uncontrollable habit for liquor, and have seen the misery and crime that come from it in my many years of city life. Many consider it more of a disease than a habit. If an effort were made to treat it as such, great good would be accomplished.

If this law is intended as a bluff to stop the railroads from transporting liquor, it will not accomplish its purpose. Railroads will handle just as much liquor as they did before. They will haul it to out-of-the-way places along State lines, and it will be carried into so-called dry territory just the same. I am sorry for many Representatives to-day who will be compelled to vote for this bill. I know there are many who want to see this bill defeated. There are men here who will vote for this measure who drink more whisky in a day than I do in a year. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not wish to deprive any person by law of a privilege that I would like to enjoy myself. I hate hypocrisy. I want to be honest with the people I represent. There is no general demand, so far as I know, by the people for this kind of legislation. I am not speaking in the interest of nor do I represent anyone connected with the liquor trade, but as a business man I do believe that the business side of the question should be considered when laws of this kind are to be passed.

In 1909 Illinois, the State I in part have the honor to represent, ranked first in the United States in the manufacture of distilled liquors. The value of the production of distilled spirits in my State for the year was $55,200,000, or 27 per cent of the total for the United States. Of the total value of products of this industry in the State in 1909, more than three-fourths ($42,758,000) represents the Federal internal-revenue tax. Illinois was first for the fiscal year 1912 in the collection of internal-revenue taxes, amounting to $52,614,483.95. Of the 67 collection districts subject to internal-revenue laws, the fifth district of Illinois reported the largest collections—$29,868,439.32. It also had the largest output of distilled spirits during the past fiscal year—28,928,567 gallons. No industry is so heavily taxed. What would support the Government should this revenue be shut off? Will the tax dodgers furnish it? Of fermented liquors my State produced 6,263,862 barrels, and the first Illinois district produced 5,321,342 barrels. In the city of Chicago, where I live, the receipts from saloon licenses is about $7,252,687 annually. The total tax otherwise collected from the liquor industry in Illinois, I believe, exceeds the amount of internal-revenue taxes paid the Federal Government.

Some idea of the wine industry of this country will be understood by a reference to a single State of the Union, to say nothing of the other great States engaged in the cultivation of the grape. It is the third largest industry in the State of California, and in the wine section, where a few years ago nothing could be seen but cactus and sagebrush along the foothills, now can be seen beautiful and prosperous settlements, with miles and miles of vineyards.

The amount of capital invested in this industry in the State is over $150,000,000, and 60,000 people, mostly small farmers, are engaged in the cultivation of these numerous vineyards.

The production of fermented liquors during the fiscal year ended June 3, 1912, was 62,176,694 barrels, or a decrease of 1,106,429 barrels, as compared with the highest record, for the year 1911. The number of breweries operated during the year was 1,461, a decrease of 31 breweries, as compared with 1911. Some idea of business conditions in the country will be noted from the following:

The total ordinary receipts of the Government for the year 1912 were $691,778,465.37.

Of this, $321,615,894.69 was collected from internal sources through the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Of this amount $149,933,706.53 was collected on distilled spirits, $62,108,633.39 on fermented malt liquors, and $7,001,967.70 from special taxes, case stamps on bottled-in-bond goods, and so forth, a total of $219,044,307.62 from the traffic in liquor.

For the four years from 1909 to 1912, inclusive, the distilled spirits withdrawn tax paid was as follows.

	Gallons.
1909	114,693,578.2
1910	126,384,726.7
1911	134,706,213.9
1912	135,913,479.6

showing total withdrawals in 1912 of 21,219,901.4 gallons in excess of 1909, notwithstanding the spread of prohibition.

During the same period the fermented malt liquors withdrawn tax paid were as follows.

	Barrels.
1909	56,303,497
1910	59,485,117
1911	63,216,851
1912	62,176,694

The above figures show that while there has been a heavy increase in the output of distilled spirits the production of beer has been practically at a standstill, leading unavoidably to the conclusion that the effect of prohibition is to increase the consumption of spirituous liquors, which can be easily handled and, owing to their very much smaller bulk, are infinitely more easily concealed than beer can be. It will be seen from this statement that prohibition causes an increase in the sale of spirituous liquors. The law will prevent wine and malt liquors from being received in prohibition States. Owing to the size of the package, it is easy to detect and the law officers can find it. People who want liquor will be supplied with vile whisky, and instead of reducing drunkenness it will encourage a lawless class, anxious to make money, to resort to the most extreme measures in order to defeat the law and rob the public.

I now call your attention to figures I have collected showing the number of illicit distilleries that were seized, as follows:

1909	1,743
1910	1,911
1911	2,471
1912	2,466

Of the whole number seized in 1912, 2,466, 1,407 were seized in the States of Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia, all of which States are understood to be nearly, if not quite, dry territory.

Illicit distilling and "bootlegging" continue without sign of abatement. During the past fiscal year practically the same number of illicit plants were seized and destroyed as during the previous fiscal year. It appears that in some sections of the country where local officers make some effort to enforce local prohibitory laws there is an increasingly greater demand for illicit whisky, and as the prices go up more persons are willing to run the risk of violating the law. When you take into consideration the number of plants running which the officers are unable to locate the taxes on the entire amount of illicit spirits so manufactured represent a large amount of revenue that is lost to the Government. It also represents and is responsible for a tremendously large disturbing element which is a promoter of lawlessness and crime in the communities where these plants are located.

This indicates conclusively that the demand for liquors is such that, where the supply is cut off by law, the resulting high prices which men are willing to pay in order to get something to satisfy their appetites afford a powerful inducement to supply that demand illegally. It would seem, therefore, that the result of legislation to prohibit the shipment of liquors into any given territory would inevitably cause an enormous increase in crimes against the revenue laws and a supplying of the demand for liquors from illicit stills. From this source the Government derives no tax.

The number of persons who paid special taxes as liquor dealers during the year 1912 in territory where the business is wholly or largely prohibited by law is as follows:

Alabama	1,304
Georgia	1,517
Iowa	3,051
Kansas	538
Kentucky	3,223
Maine	924
Nebraska	2,440
North Carolina	619
North Dakota	679
Oklahoma	1,104
South Carolina	1,040
South Dakota	1,238
Tennessee	2,078
Virginia	1,413

In conclusion, I draw the deduction from these figures and facts that prohibition does not prohibit; that the exclusion of liquors as contemplated by this act will have the opposite result to that which those seeking this legislation desire; that the users of malt liquors will hereafter drink spirit liquors, and the latter will be manufactured regardless of its quality or its effect on the human body. A premium will be offered to the "moonshiners" and others engaged in this lawless traffic. The vineyards of this country will be destroyed. The great property interests and the vast amount of capital invested in the liquor trade will be irreparably injured. The nature and the effect of this character of legislation would be to confiscate property by process of law. The Nation, the States, and the municipalities will suffer the loss of the income from which these governments derive their principal support. No substitute revenue is offered. This bill, if enacted into law, will mean ruin to the millions and millions of dollars invested in great legitimate enterprises. It would place in the list of unemployed an army of many hundreds of thousands who would be affected directly or indirectly by this legislation. No President can sign such a bill; no President will. I am opposed to the passage of any such law. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, if there is any trepidation in my nature, it would have removed me from this seat after hearing the argument of the gentleman from Georgia and the other gentleman who succeeded him just as quickly as my constituents removed me from this Hall. Mr. Speaker, I was a practitioner of the bars in the early days of my life. I had occasion to go out many times and cuss the court deciding the case and very many times to go out from the other bar and cuss the proprietor for serving such bad whisky [laughter], going away with a headache in one case and disgruntled in the other. But, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill because it makes all of us, severally and individually, our own barkeepers; and since I am compelled to go back to one or both of these bars [laughter], I am going to go along the lines of least resistance and vote for the bill. I would not refer to this fact except in connection with an editorial printed in the Commoner on the 17th of January, by the great commoner, statesman, and advocate of moral uplift, and I read just one sentence from that editorial:

What Democrat——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I will ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and also include another editorial that is due on the desks of all Members elaborating this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right already.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

A GOOD DEMOCRATIC MEASURE.

A measure pending in Congress and giving to the States absolute power over the shipment of liquor is good and ought to be enacted into law. It is called the Kenyon-Sheppard bill and proceeds upon sound Democratic theory. Long ago Mr. Bryan favored such a measure, and in the Commoner, April 22, 1910, he wrote an editorial, in which he said: "Interstate commerce is used to override State laws. What Democrat is willing to put himself on record against the proposition that the right of the people of a State to control the liquor traffic is more sacred than the right of liquor dealers to dispose of their product in dry territory and in violation of the law? Mr. Bryan believes that Congress should pass a law recognizing the right of each State to prescribe the conditions upon which intoxicating liquors can be transported, sold, and used within its borders. He also believes that the Federal Government should dissolve partnership with lawbreakers and no longer issue licenses for the sale of liquor in communities where local laws prohibit its sale. If it is thought unconstitutional to discriminate in the issue of licenses between different communities, the same end can be reached by reducing the license to a nominal figure and requiring the applicant for a Federal license to give written notice to the local authorities and newspaper notice to the local public of his intention to apply for a license. Now let those who oppose these propositions meet them with arguments."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. How much time has the gentleman from New Jersey?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my sympathy for those great constitutional lawyers who wear the Constitution as a hobble skirt and fall down every time they try to go forward and fall down every time they try to go to the right or to the left, who can only stand still where they are until they shrivel up or turn to a pillar of salt like Lot's wife. [Laughter and applause.] I want to ask every Member of this House who wants to accomplish the purposes for which this bill is intended, or anything like it, to vote for it without amendment. I ask you to vote every one of these amendments down. This is a battle that is being fought under the command of a general, under the command of the chairman of this great Committee on the Judiciary, and we can not here on the spur of the moment undertake to change the plan of battle and hope to win. Let us follow our gallant leaders who have given this matter nearly two years' continuous investigation and study and we can not fail to win. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it is always noticeable that no plan can be suggested to control any evil, where profit is to flow from its pursuit, that those engaged in it do not flee to the Constitution for shelter and protection. We can hardly propose any kind of control or regulation of the liquor traffic, by either State or National legislation, that we are not immediately warned by those engaged in the traffic that we are violating the Constitution. They become immediately the stout defenders and protectors of the organic law. Written constitutions are nothing more than statutory enactments in general terms made difficult to repeal. But we do not find our friends who are engaged in the liquor business crying out for the observance of ordinary statutory enactments or for the enforcement of ordinary laws and police regulations.

They are vigorous in their demand for the observance of constitutional limitations by legislative bodies, whenever these bodies have under consideration any proposed legislation looking to the better control and regulation of their business; but when it comes to complying with statutory limitations upon the conduct of their business, in the interest of public health and public morals, they cry out oppression and coercion and refuse to obey the laws, and denounce them as arbitrary and despotic, and that we are trying to legislate the bad habits and bad appetites out of men and to legislate good habits and good morals into them.

Mr. Speaker, such arguments have no effect on me in determining how I shall vote on this bill, not because I do not feel the binding force of constitutional restrictions upon our power to legislate on this as well as on all other questions coming before us. I have never known an attempt to control by legislation any kind or character of business that would, in the opinion of those engaged in it, make it less profitable that the unconstitutionality of the measure was not immediately charged in opposition to its enactment.

Mr. Speaker, when we had before this House a few years ago a bill to prohibit the white-slave traffic, some of the best men and best lawyers in this body at that time opposed its passage on the ground that we had no constitutional power to enact such legislation under the commerce clause of the Constitution, that the white-slave traffic was not commerce, in the sense used in the Constitution. These same gentlemen were as anxious as any of us to prevent the white-slave traffic, but felt constrained by the Constitution and voted against the bill. I said in argument in support of that measure that I did not know how the courts would hold on the question of the constitutionality of the law; that I did not believe the bill was unconstitutional; and that the white-slave traffic could not be successfully dealt with by the States and that when I was in doubt, I would solve the doubt in favor of the best interest of the public and voted for that bill, and I intend to do so on this occasion. The white-slave law has been very successfully enforced ever since its enactment and no court has held it unconstitutional in any respect.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be excused for indulging in a few observations even at the risk of it being charged that they do not pertain to the bill under consideration at this time.

The question of governmental control and regulation of the liquor traffic is not new, either in this or foreign countries, and at this late day it seems to remain an unsolved problem.

We hear much said about taking the liquor business out of politics and keeping it out. Nothing would please me more than to see this done; but I want to ask our ardent and zealous friends of such a proposition, How is it going to be accomplished? I used to hear a great deal said along the same line about keeping the railroads out of politics, and after studying the question for quite a while I decided that the only way to keep the railroads out of politics was to keep politics out of the railroads; in other words, to cease to legislate concerning railroads. But I had to admit to myself that while my remedy would certainly take the railroads out of politics, it was impossible to cease legislating concerning railroads. So, Mr. Speaker, as I see it now, I never expect to see the railroads out of politics.

But to recur to my inquiry as to how we are going to take the liquor business out of politics, I have reached the same conclusion—that we must first take politics out of the liquor business. The Government is not in the railroad business and does not share in the profits derived in the pursuit of such business. Can it be thus said of the liquor business?

The Federal Government taxes the manufacture of whisky in a sum equal to several hundred per cent of its total value as a manufactured product. I am not informed as to the actual value of whisky untaxed, but I am told that it is about 25 or 30 cents per gallon, while the Government tax is $1.10 per gallon. Is there any other article of manufacture that bears anything like so heavy a tax as does whisky? Such a tax on almost any other article of manufacture would be absolutely prohibitive. The amount of this tax is strongly suggestive of the purpose being prohibition rather than revenue production. If the intention was prohibition, it is a failure; if revenue was the only object and purpose, it is excessive and unjust.

Mr. Speaker, practical prohibition by the United States Government can be brought about by levying a tax on intoxicating liquors so high as to become prohibitive without any amendment to the Federal Constitution.

There is no law of Congress that I am aware of that forbids the issuance of notes to circulate as money by State banks, but there is a Federal tax upon such notes equal to 10 per cent of face value, which does most effectually prohibit the issuance of such notes. A tax levied upon whisky, wine, and beer by the Federal Government large enough would most effectually prevent the manufacture and sale of such liquors in every State in the Union and in all Districts and Territories under the jurisdiction of the United States without supplementary legislation by any State or Territory, and such a law could and would be enforced. Such a law of Congress would most effectually take the liquor business out of politics for the plain and simple reason that there would be no liquor business to go into politics. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we want universal, Nation-wide prohibition we know how to get it, by congressional action and remove most effectually every manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, and saloonkeeper in the United States from participation in politics.

But, on the other hand, if national prohibition is not desired nor intended, why retain a rate of taxation on the liquor business by the Federal, State, county, and municipal governments that not only permits but drives every man engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors into city, county, State, and National politics?

Under the existing high-license and high-tax systems prevailing in the United States, the Federal, State, county, and municipal governments are actual profit-sharing copartners with the manufacturers and dealers in intoxicating liquors. How can we denounce a traffic as immoral, as destructive of public health, and as a producer or promoter of almost every crime under the sun while sharing the profits of that traffic? If our Federal tax is intended to prohibit the traffic, then make it effective by making it high enough to accomplish that purpose. But, on the other hand, if it is intended simply to produce revenue, reduce the tax to a revenue basis. If the taxation imposed on the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors was no higher than is imposed on so-called legitimate business, then the liquor maker and liquor seller would have no greater interest in politics than those engaged in other lines of business.

I know it is a policy of our people to tax luxuries higher than the necessaries of life, and that liquors and tobacco are classed, for purposes of taxation, as luxuries. But a tax upon intoxicating liquors out of all proportion to commodity value has made it more profitable to dodge these heavy taxes and thus secure a higher money return on a smaller amount of the commodity dealt in than by paying the tax and thus securing a much smaller money return on a much larger volume of the commodity handled. This condition naturally breeds the bootlegger, the illicit distiller, the smuggler, the license dodger, and law violators generally that this bill is intended to reach.

This system of high license and high taxation has brought into all our political units, from the smallest city ward to the wide domain of the Nation itself, all persons interested in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, or who are making money by violating the laws of State and Nation regulating and controlling this traffic, and it is useless and a waste of time to talk about removing this influence from politics while the cause and inducement for this active participation remains.

Mr. Speaker, millions of dollars are expended annually by the liquor traffic in all its phases in controlling ward meetings, village meetings, city meetings, county and State conventions, city, county, and State primaries, and even national conventions, all for the purpose of protecting the money profits of this business. No such a burden is necessary to the life of any other business in our country. Besides these things, the liquor business is often laid under tribute by municipal officers as a compensation for lax enforcement of the laws. Just as long as it is profitable for those engaged in the liquor business to spend their money in controlling conventions, primaries, and legislative bodies, just so long will their money be so used, and all attempts to prevent it by simple regulatory statutes will be unavailing. We must either make the tax prohibitive or so reduce it that it will not be profitable to evade it or dodge it or to expend vast sums of money in seeking to control politics and legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I am not addressing myself to the effect such legislation as I am discussing will have upon the use of intoxicating liquors. As a general rule, the more difficult it is to get intoxicating liquors the less such liquors are used. I am addressing myself alone to the effect that our present system of high license and high taxation of the liquor traffic has upon legislation and politics.

If the tax was either removed altogether or so reduced that it would not be profitable to use so much time and personal effort and to expend vast sums of money in the control or attempt to control the politics of ward, county, State, and Nation, I think it would be much easier to enact and to enforce prohibition laws in the States, counties, cities, and wards than it is now. If the high taxes and high licenses were removed or greatly reduced, the competition in manufacture and sale would be so sharp that the profits of the business would be so small that it would not pay to spend such vast sums of money in controlling or attempting to control politics and legislation. It does not follow that because competition in manufacture would be greatly increased by removal of these heavy, discriminating taxes that it would lessen the desire or reduce the demand for prohibition State laws or local-option laws. But it would make it much easier to both pass and enforce such laws.

It would require no great effort to enforce a State law against the manufacture and sale of soda water, although to do so would be as much of an infraction of the personal liberty of the citizen as if it was a law to prohibit the manufacture and sale of whisky. But the profits of the soda-water business would not be such as to make it profitable to expend the large sums of money necessary to thwart the will of the people.

If there was no Federal tax, or a very small revenue tax, on the manufacture and sale of whisky, we would have no Whisky Trust.

Mr. Speaker, the revenue necessities of the Government are not such, nor can they ever be such, as to justify its practical partnership in the whisky business, if that business is the cause of all the crime, misery, and poverty that is laid at its door.

If we impose a prohibitive tax on the traffic, it will end it and make prohibition complete and effective in every State in the Union. If we remove or reduce the tax, the control of legislation and politics by the use of money in shaping legislation in the States and subdivisions thereof will cease and then prohibitive legislation in the States can and will be enforced.

Mr. Speaker, if all the crime, misery, and poverty that is charged up against the liquor traffic is a true and just accusation, how can we justify ourselves in voting a tax upon such a source of evil simply because our salaries and other Government expenses are paid in part from the fund arising from the imposition of such a tax?

Shall we tolerate the existence of a public evil simply because that evil is willing to turn into the Public Treasury a part of its profits as the price of its existence?

Mr. Speaker, on February 21, 1743, 170 years ago, while a bill was pending before the House of Lords in the Parliament of England for the purpose of licensing and taxing the sale of gin, Lord Chesterfield delivered a notable speech bearing on the question of accepting tax money for the permission to sell gin, an intoxicating liquor. As bearing on what I have just said, I will now read that speech in my time as part of my remarks:

"To desire therefore, my Lords, that this bill may be considered in a committee is only to desire that it may gain one step without opposition; that it may proceed through the forms of the house by stealth, and that the consideration of it may be delayed till the exigencies of the Government shall be so great as not to allow time for raising the supplies by any other method.

"By this artifice, gross as it is, the patrons of this wonderful bill hope to obstruct a plain and open detection of its tendency. They hope, my Lords, that the bill shall operate in the same manner with the liquor which it is intended to bring into more general use; and that as those who drink spirits are drunk before they are well aware that they are drinking, the effects of this law shall be perceived before we know that we have made it. Their intent is to give us a dram of policy which is to be swallowed before it is tasted and which, when once it is swallowed, will turn our heads.

"But, my Lords, I hope we shall be so cautious as to examine the draft which these state empirics have thought proper to offer us, and I am confident that a very little examination will convince us of the pernicious qualities of their new preparation and show that it can have no other effect than that of poisoning the public.

"The law before us, my Lords, seems to be the effect of that practice of which it is intended likewise to be the cause and to be dictated by the liquor of which it so effectually promotes the use, for surely it never before was conceived by any man intrusted with the administration of public affairs to raise taxes by the destruction of the people.

"Nothing, my Lords, but the destruction of all the most laborious and useful part of the nation can be expected from the license which is now proposed to be given not only to drunkenness but to drunkenness of the most detestable and dangerous kind, to the abuse not only of intoxicating but of poisonous liquors.

"Nothing, my Lords, is more absurd than to assert that the use of spirits will be hindered by the bill now before us, or, indeed, that it will not be in a very great degree promoted by it. For what produces all kind of wickedness but the prospect of impunity on the one part or the solicitation of opportunity on the other? Either of these have too frequently been sufficient to overpower the sense of morality and even of religion, and what is not to be feared from them when they shall unite their force and operate together, when temptations shall be increased and terror taken away?

"It is allowed by those who have hitherto disputed on either side of this question that the people appear obstinately enamored of this new liquor; it is allowed on both parts that this liquor corrupts the mind and enervates the body and destroys vigor and virtue at the same time that it makes those who drink it too idle and too feeble for work, and while it impoverishes them by the present expense, disables them from retrieving its ill consequences by subsequent industry.

"It might be imagined, my Lords, that those who had thus far agreed would not easily find any occasions of dispute, nor would any man unacquainted with the motives by which parliamentary debates are too often influenced suspect that after the pernicious qualities of this liquor and the general inclination among the people to the immoderate use of it had been generally admitted it could be afterwards inquired whether it ought to be made more common, whether this universal thirst for poison ought to be encouraged by the legislature, and whether a new statute ought to be made to secure drunkards in the gratification of their appetites.

"To pretend, my Lords, that the design of this bill is to prevent or diminish the use of spirits is to trample upon common sense and to violate the rules of decency as well as of reason. For when did any man hear that a commodity was prohibited by licensing its sale or that to offer and refuse is the same action?

"It is indeed pleaded that it will be made dearer by the tax which is proposed, and that the increase of the price will diminish the number of the purchasers; but it is at the same time expected that this tax shall supply the expense of a war on the Continent. It is asserted therefore that the consumption of spirits will be hindered, and yet that it will be such as may be expected to furnish, from a very small tax, a revenue sufficient for the support of armies, for the reestablishment of the Austrian family, and the repressing of the attempts of France.

"Surely, my Lords, these expectations are not very consistent, nor can it be imagined that they are both formed in the same head, though they may be expressed by the same mouth. It is, however, some recommendation of a statesman when, of his assertions, one can be found reasonable or true; and in this praise can not be denied to our present ministers, for though it is undoubtedly false that this tax will lessen the consumption of spirits, it is certainly true that it will produce a very large revenue, a revenue that will not fail but with the people from whose debaucheries it arises.

"Our ministers will therefore have the same honor with their predecessors of having given rise to a new fund, not, indeed, for the payment of our debts but for much more valuable purposes—for the cheering of our hearts under oppression and for the ready support of those debts which we have lost hopes of paying. They are resolved, my Lords, that the nation, which no endeavors can make wise, shall while they are at its head at least be merry; and since public happiness is the end of government, they seem to imagine that they shall deserve applause by an expedient which will enable every man to lay his cares asleep, to drown sorrow, and lose in the delights of drunkenness both the public miseries and his own.

"Luxury, my Lords, is to be taxed, but vice prohibited, let the difficulties in executing the law be what they will. Would you lay a tax upon a breach of the Ten Commandments? Would not such a tax be wicked and scandalous, because it would imply an indulgence to all those who could pay the tax? Is not this a reproach most justly thrown by Protestants upon the Church of Rome? Was it not the chief cause of the Reformation? And will you follow a precedent which brought reproach and ruin upon those that introduced it? This is the very case now before us. You are going to lay a tax, and consequently to indulge a sort of drunkenness which almost necessarily produces a breach of every one of the Ten Commandments. Can you expect the reverend bench will approve of this? I am convinced they will not, and therefore I wish I had seen it full upon this occasion. I am sure I have seen it much fuller upon some other occasions, in which religion had no such deep concern.

"We have already, my Lords, several sorts of funds in this nation, so many that a man must have a good deal of learning to be master of them. Thanks to His Majesty, we have now amongst us the most learned man of the nation in this way. I wish he would rise up and tell us what name we are to give to this new fund. We have already the civil-list fund, the sinking fund, the aggregate fund, the South Sea fund, and God knows how many others. What name we are to give to this new fund I know not, unless we are to call it the drinking fund. It may perhaps enable the people of a certain foreign territory to drink claret, but it will disable the people of this Kingdom from drinking anything else but gin, for when a man has by gin drinking rendered himself unfit for labor or business he can purchase nothing else, and then the best thing he can do is to drink on till he dies.

"Surely, my Lords, men of such unbounded benevolence as our present ministers deserve such honors as were never paid before; they deserve to bestride a butt upon every signpost in the city or to have their figures exhibited as tokens where this liquor is to be sold by the license which they have procured. They must be at least remembered to future ages as the happy politicians, who after all expedients for raising taxes had been employed discovered a new method of draining the last relics of the public wealth and added a new revenue to the Government, nor will those who shall hereafter enumerate the several funds now established among us forget among the benefactors to their country the illustrious authors of the drinking fund.

"May I be allowed, my Lords, to congratulate my countrymen and fellow subjects upon the happy times which are now approaching, in which no man will be disqualified from the privilege of being drunk, when all discontent and disloyalty shall be forgotten, and the people, though now considered by the ministry as enemies, shall acknowledge the lenity of that government under which all restraints are taken away?

"But to a bill for such desirable purposes it would be proper, my Lords, to prefix a preamble, in which the kindness of our intentions should be more fully explained; that the nation may not mistake our indulgence for cruelty, nor consider their benefactors as their persecutors. If, therefore, this bill be considered and amended—for why else should it be considered?—in a committee, I shall humbly propose that it shall be introduced in this manner:

"'Whereas the designs of the present ministry, whatever they are, can not be executed without a great number of mercenaries, which mercenaries can not be hired without money; and whereas the present disposition of this nation to drunkenness inclines us to believe that they will pay more cheerfully for the undisturbed enjoyment of distilled liquors than for any other concession that can be made by the Government; be it enacted by the King's most excellent majesty that no man shall hereafter be denied the right of being drunk on the following conditions.'

"This, my Lords, to trifle no longer, is the proper preamble to this bill, which contains only the conditions on which the people of this Kingdom are to be allowed henceforward to riot in debauchery—in debauchery licensed by law and countenanced by the magistrates; for there is no doubt but those on whom the inventors of this tax shall confer authority will be directed to assist their masters in their design to encourage the consumption of that liquor from which such large revenues are expected and to multiply without end those licenses which are to pay a yearly tribute to the Crown.

"By this unbounded license, my Lords, that price will be lessened from the increase of which the expectations of the efficacy of this law are pretended, for the number of retailers will lessen the value, as in all other cases, and lessen it more than this tax will increase it. Besides, it is to be considered that at present the retailer expects to be paid for the danger which he incurs by an unlawful trade, and will not trust his reputation or his purse to the mercy of his customer without a profit proportioned to the hazard; but when once the restraint shall be taken away he will sell for common gain, and it can hardly be imagined that at present he subjects himself to informations and penalties for less than 6 pence a gallon.

"The specious pretense on which this bill is founded—and indeed, the only pretense that deserves to be termed specious—is the propriety of taxing vice, but this maxim of government has on this occasion been either mistaken or perverted. Vice, my Lords, is not properly to be taxed but suppressed, and heavy taxes are sometimes the only means by which that suppression can be attained. Luxury, my Lords, or the excess of that which is pernicious only by its excess, may very properly be taxed, that such excess, though not strictly unlawful, may be made more difficult. But the use of those things which are simply hurtful—hurtful in their own nature and in every degree—is to be prohibited. None, my Lords, ever heard in any nation of a tax upon theft or adultery, because a tax implies a license granted for the use of that which is taxed to all who shall be willing to pay it.

"Drunkenness, my Lords, is universally and in all circumstances an evil, and, therefore, ought not to be taxed but punished, and the means of it not to be made easy by a slight impost, which none can feel, but to be removed out of the reach of the people and secured by the heaviest taxes, levied with the utmost rigor. I hope those to whose care the religion of the nation is particularly consigned will unanimously join with me in maintaining the necessity not of taxing vice but suppressing it, and unite for the rejection of a bill by which the future as well as present happiness of thousands must be destroyed."

Mr. CLAYTON. I will ask the gentleman to use some of his time.

Mr. McCOY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to record my vote in favor of this bill, and in doing so I feel that the dry States are entitled to this protection. This bill does not interfere with or prohibit the shipment of liquor from wet States into wet States, but it will prohibit the shipment of liquor from wet States into dry States. The fight for such legislation has been going on for many years, and each year the necessity for this legislation becomes more marked. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who opposes this bill, and claims the States should control in this matter, can easily realize, if he knew the situation that now exists, that the States can not control. My district being on the border of Ohio, Kentucky, and Virginia, makes it more marked how this law is being violated. Take, for instance, the State law of Kentucky prohibits the shipment of liquors from wet counties into dry counties, and in order to evade this law the people who are engaged in the liquor business in Kentucky bring their shipments just over the line into West Virginia, and then ship it to any county in Kentucky, and thus evade the State law of Kentucky. Now, I think interstate-commerce restrictions should be so amended that this could not be done, and I, for one, am not willing to longer postpone action on this measure. It is my intention to vote for the amendment offered by Congressman DAVIS, from West Virginia, a member of the Judiciary Committee, as I feel there should be a penalty more severe than the Webb bill now provides. Some have said, however, that this will make this bill unconstitutional. I do not believe this, and if I did I would not vote for his amendment; but I hope that his amendment will be adopted and that the bill will pass.

There are other injustices which I feel are being done, and I have introduced a bill to try to remedy them. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue issues what he calls a "special tax stamp." I feel that the people should be protected by prohibiting the use of this "special tax stamp" where the State and county authorities prohibit the sale of liquor. To show the position the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has taken with reference to this legislation, I am going to ask that a letter from him addressed to me be printed as a part of my remarks, but I want to say now that the argument which he uses, that the present law aids the enforcement of local-option laws in the counties, I do not agree with. For some good reason the violators of the law are more afraid of revenue officers than they are of the local authorities, and if they did not feel that the Federal Government was behind them in a way, for the reason that they have issued to them this license, or "special tax stamp" as they may call it, they would not violate the law as they do now, and instead of its helping out the cause, as suggested by the honorable commissioner, it allows them to carry on this traffic when they would not otherwise do so:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 12, 1912.

Hon. JAMES A. HUGHES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HUGHES: Referring to your personal call this morning with respect to information furnished some of your constituents relative to the "issuing by the United States Government of licenses to persons to retail liquors in prohibition territory," I have the honor to state that the persons addressing such inquiries to you are evidently under somewhat of a misapprehension as to the position of the National Government.

The National Government issues no licenses of any kind to sell liquors, but it taxes the business of selling liquors, and, as specifically required by Congress, a special stamp is issued as a receipt for the payment of such tax. Section 3232, Revised Statutes, in connection with section 3244 as amended, provides as follows:

"No person shall be engaged in or carry on any trade or business hereinafter mentioned until he has paid a special tax therefor in the manner hereinafter provided * * *."

"That retail dealers in liquors shall pay $25.

"That every person who sells or offers for sale foreign or domestic distilled spirits, wines, or malt liquors, otherwise than as hereinafter provided, in less quantities than 5 wine gallons at the same time, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in liquors."

The tax paid is represented by a stamp, and section 3183, Revised Statutes, prohibits a collector from issuing any receipt in lieu thereof. Furthermore, section 3243 provides that—

"The payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws for carrying on any trade or business shall not be held to exempt any person from any penalty or punishment provided by the laws of any State for carrying on the same within such State, or in any manner to authorize the commencement or continuance of such trade or business contrary to the laws of such State or in places prohibited by municipal law; * * *."

There are numerous other statutory provisions, and almost every clause of these statutes has been construed in the Federal courts. The Constitution of the United States provides that all taxes shall be uniform throughout the United States. The laws above referred to are general laws applicable to the entire United States, and the President of the United States would have no more right to nullify the laws in a so-called "dry" territory than he would in a so-called "wet" territory. Undoubtedly the spirit of comity to which you refer in your letter is very desirable, but, with respect to the sale of alcoholic beverages, the Federal laws and certain local laws are in direct conflict, so that complete comity is more or less an impossibility. Under the Federal statutes and the decisions of the Supreme Court alcoholic beverages constitute a legitimate article of commerce, and the occupation of selling alcoholic beverages, under Federal statutes, is a legitimate occupation, for the prosecution of which the Federal statutes impose a Federal tax. So far as the Federal laws are concerned the place of transacting this business is entirely immaterial. If a person engages in the selling of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, the Federal tax is collected; if he engages in business in the State of New York, the same tax is collected; if in California, Georgia, Tennessee, or West Virginia, the same tax is collected.

There is no authority vested in any administrative officer from the President down to waive the tax or to decline to collect it when liability therefor is shown. It is entirely within the province of the State, in the exercise of its police powers, to prevent the occupation being followed, but if, without regarding local laws, a person does engage in this occupation, that does not relieve him from his liability to the Federal statutes. The only way in which the Government could fail to collect this tax in West Virginia would be for the Congress to repeal this tax provision all through the United States. Then, of course, the Federal Government would have no interest in the matter at all and would withdraw its officers and tax collectors from this branch of work all through the United States. It would appear to this office that this action would be the worst blow that could befall the persons who are sincerely desirous of enforcing local prohibitory or semiprohibitory laws.

Section 3240, Revised Statutes, provides that each collector shall keep conspicuously in his office for public inspection a list of all persons who have paid special taxes, with the place and business for which the tax was paid. Information received in this office indicates that this is one of the greatest aids in the enforcement of local laws. Of course, if no Federal tax was collected the Federal Government would have no occasion to collect such data or to be interested in any way in the local transactions of liquor dealers.

A number of bills have been introduced with a view of having the Federal Government collect the tax in some sections of the country and not in other sections of the country, or to restrict the tax collections in various ways, all of which bills appear to this office to be unconstitutional. As above stated, however, a very simple way to handle the situation would be to repeal the taxing law on liquor dealers all over the United States, and this appears to be to this office the only way that the matter could be handled.

Very respectfully,

R. E. CABELL, Commissioner.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, stripped of its legal verbiage this bill seeks to prohibit the shipment of intoxicating liquors from one State into another State, where the consignee has the intent to use the article in violation of the laws of the State into which it is shipped. The language of the pending bill is as follows:

That the shipment or transportation * * * of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind from one State * * * into any State * * * which said * * * liquor is intended by any person interested therein to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State * * * is hereby prohibited.

In my representative capacity I shall vote for this bill because I am advised that a majority of my constituents wish me to do so, and I am willing on that account to forego any objections which I have for the purpose of executing their will. However, I would not feel content if I did not express some of my views regarding this legislation, and I shall do so very briefly.

In my judgment, its constitutionality is a debatable question, although I have not reached such a firm conclusion upon this point as would constrain me under my oath of office to oppose it on that ground. The act which is prohibited is the shipment and transportation of intoxicating liquors under certain conditions, and to this extent it is a prohibition and not a regulation of interstate commerce. Under the express terms of the Constitution Congress alone has the power to regulate commerce among the several States. It will be observed that no penalty is attached to the violation of this prohibition against the shipment and transportation of intoxicating liquors, and, by the declaration of its sponsors, it was not deemed advisable to provide any penalty for a violation of this prohibition. They have even gone so far as to say that the discussion of a penalty indicated opposition to the spirit of this bill, and that its real friends had no desire to punish any shipper or common carrier for its violation. Probably the real reason is attributable to the fear that the penalty could not be enforced, because of its uncertainty and indefiniteness. To inflict punishment upon a citizen for an alleged violation of a law when he could only ascertain that the act complained of was prohibited because of an undisclosed intent upon the part of the citizen of another State to violate the laws of that State would certainly contravene the basic proposition that a man shall know with reasonable certainty what law he is violating and the manner in which he is violating it at the time of his offense. Substantially, then, it may be said that shipments of intoxicating liquors from one State into another may proceed just as they have in the past. About the only effect will be to induce the shipper to require payment in advance and to impair the credit of the consignee. If the consignment may be seized under the laws of the State before it reaches the consignee, or after it is delivered, then the shipper may decide to relieve himself of all doubt as to receiving payment and may refuse to extend credit.

The proposed inhibition against shipment and transportation is based upon an intent existing and undisclosed in the mind of the consignee to use the intoxicating liquor in a manner contrary to the law of the State. This is a nebulous premise upon which to base the conduct of another citizen as to whether this other citizen is or is not violating the law. Certainly it will not control the shipper or the common carrier, but it is said that the authorities of the State in the enforcement of its own law will be able to determine this intent, not by positive evidence but by attendant circumstances, such as the general character of the consignee, and the quantity of intoxicating liquor which has been shipped to him. If intoxicating liquor is property in the eye of the law, and if the owner of the property is entitled to the possession of this liquor for his own use, then it would be rather an unusual extension of the law to take this property from him upon the ground that he intended to use it in violation of the law. None of the States which have enacted prohibition laws applicable either to the entire State or to subdivisions thereof have attempted to go further than to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. They have not interdicted the possession of liquor for personal consumption, nor have they attempted to prohibit its temperate use.

What is the real purpose of this law? It is admitted that the States possess exclusively the police power to regulate intoxicating liquors and to enact and enforce all other laws affecting the life, health, peace, or property of its citizens. It is difficult to conceive a limit which might be placed upon the police power of a State to control the manufacture, sale, or consumption of intoxicating liquors. Referring to those States or subdivisions which have prohibited the manufacture and sale of this article, it is contended that the enforcement of such laws are impaired or made difficult because of interstate shipments. The purpose of all prohibition laws is to curtail or prevent the use of intoxicating liquors, and it is said that this purpose is thwarted because of the interstate-commerce privilege. If citizens desire to further prevent the use and consumption of liquor, they should not appeal to Congress, which has no jurisdiction, but they should appeal to the legislatures of their States, which possess exclusive police powers to deal with the subject.

Again, it is asserted that the main purpose of this bill is to deprive interstate consignments of liquor of their protection as interstate commerce immediately after crossing the boundary line of the State, or at any rate before delivery to the consignee. Under the Constitution and the laws as now construed, I am unable to see how this purpose can be accomplished. After the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Leisy v. Harding (135 U. S., 100), which substantially held that the consignee of intoxicating liquors could sell the same in the original package, notwithstanding the law of the State prohibiting such sale, Congress, on August 8, 1890, passed what was known as the Wilson bill, which it may be well to quote here:

> All fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory, enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

In construing this statute the Supreme Court in two cases—One hundred and fortieth United States, page 545, and in Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412)—held that the words "upon arrival in said State or Territory" meant arrival at the point of destination and delivery to the consignee. With reference to the pending bill, it is difficult to understand upon what theory the court will hold differently. I am of the opinion that if the present bill becomes a law interstate shipments, under the Constitution, will be protected by the commerce clause until actually delivered. If my contention be correct, then the proposed law would be futile and would not enlarge the power of the States to enforce their own police laws.

Having pointed out in a brief way some of the difficulties which surround this legislation, I will direct inquiry as to its constitutionality. I have not the time or the inclination to discuss this important question fully. I will present only one phase. The Constitution confers upon Congress the exclusive power to regulate commerce among the States. Just as each State possesses plenary police powers, so does Congress possess the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce. It is here attempted to prohibit interstate commerce in liquor upon a certain condition.

The condition is that intoxicating liquors shall not be shipped into another State where the person to whom it is shipped intends to use it in violation of the law of that State. If there should be no law of the State regulating the use of liquor, then, admittedly, the inhibition against this interstate commerce would not attach. Therefore the question of the prohibition of this commerce depends for its vitality upon the law of the State, and we are driven to the conclusion that the State, by its action or nonaction, controls interstate commerce. Congress may not delegate this exclusive Federal function to any State. Further, this inhibition of commerce is not predicated upon an existing fact which may be determined, but merely upon an intent to do an act which might create an existing fact. I felt that justice to myself and my desire for truth rendered it necessary for me to make these comments upon the proposed law. If what I have said finds justification, either under the Constitution and laws or in consideration of wise policy, then they only illustrate the difficulties involved in the problem of total prohibition in the traffic and use of intoxicating liquors. Regardless of what my individual views may be as to the best and wisest methods of promoting temperance and abating the recognized evils from the intemperate use of intoxicating liquors, I sincerely espouse the cause of temperance, sobriety, and good morals. Whether local option or State-wide prohibition is the better remedy every good citizen must sympathize with the militant crusade against intemperance. There are many who believe that laws, rigidly regulating the traffic in and the consumption of intoxicating liquors, proceed along saner and wiser lines, and will result in better enforcement of the laws and will also preserve greater respect for the laws. All these questions are not for Congress to determine. We are confronted with a single question, whether under the Constitution this proposed law is valid, and if so, whether it will accomplish the purpose intended. Personally I hope that both queries may be answered in the affirmative, but I felt that I must preserve my intellectual integrity and express my best judgment upon both propositions.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, the title of the bill we are about to vote upon is in these words: "A bill to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases." Under the protection of this interstate-commerce clause foreign whisky houses defy the laws of the States, furnish the vile alcoholic concoctions upon which "blind tigers" and "speakeasies" flourish and lead men into the temptation of "moonshine" stilling. All of which the liquor lobbyist and his agents hypocritically protest against. This day's vote will put them to the test. The essence of this bill makes it against Federal law for any person to ship or any person to receive intoxicating liquors in a prohibition State where such liquor is intended to be sold or used contrary to the laws of the State into which it is shipped. It does not interfere with the shipment or reception of liquors for lawful personal consumption or for any purpose not prohibited by State law. So it will be seen that it is not the purpose and object of this bill that the Government shall enforce State temperance laws nor interfere with the enforcement of prohibition laws, but it simply and only leaves and remits to each State complete power and control over interstate shipments or purchase of intoxicating liquors for any and all purposes. It expressly concedes to Georgia and the other States the exclusive authority to exercise their sovereign powers without hindrance by Federal authority as to the regulation or prohibition of the liquor traffic. No Democrat and no man who believes in the rule of the people can object to this legislation. Whoever is opposed to local State government may well oppose this bill, but no one else can. Personally I prefer making the bill more sweeping in some of its provisions, but being anxious for some wholesome legislation now, I accept this bill as reported by the committee and approved, so far as I am advised, by the temperance organizations of the country.

Speaking for myself, I should like to see the Government in partnership with the States for the enforcement of penal laws against the whisky traffic as it is in partnership with the State for enforcement of many other criminal laws. This course is evidently now not ripe for action. The measure, however, which we are about to pass is not offered as a panacea for all obstacles to temperance-law enforcement, nor is it the finality of legislation on this subject. The bill now before the House goes only so far as to withdraw the Government and its powers from direct partnership with the nefarious intoxicating liquor business and the "blind tiger" traffic. Let not the enemies of any legislation on this question load it down with such amendments as at present we know will mean its death in the Senate or in conference. I fear even now at this stage of the Sixty-second Congress, with but a few days remaining, that the final realization of our hopes may be deferred. Complication of amendments, however salutory they may be, are but calculated to increase the grounds for this fear and augment the dangers ahead.

Mr. Speaker, able gentlemen have risen on this floor to propound the dangers that are in the constitutional questions involved. They need not have done that. For months every Member's mail has been flooded by the voluminous briefs, which I now hold in my hand, of the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association, the Model License League, the Liberty League, and every organization engaged in the liquor business of this country, expounding and interpreting the Constitution of our country and warning us that this legislation is unconstitutional. Great God! has the time come when honorable Members rise on the floor and engage in partnership with the views of the liquor traffic of this country and their legal hirelings in their interpretation of the fundamental law of our fathers? The ravenous buzzard, with his morbid talons buried in the decaying flesh of his rotting victim, with his gluttonous beak smeared and dripping with the putrid vitals of his lifeless carcass, is a noble animal by comparison with that merciless flock of human buzzards who, under the guise of interstate commerce, for sordid gain and enriched coffers, defy public sentiment, respect the law of no sovereign State, in order that they may grow fat on the lifeblood of their unfortunate fellow men [applause]; who, like demons of perdition, claw out the disconsolate hearts of tens of thousands of tortured, pleading women; who remorselessly hurl into the bottomless pits of bitterness, hopelessness, and despair the starving, naked, wailing, alcohol-orphanized childhood of this land.

A vote for this bill, if nothing more, will be a rebuke to, and solemn declaration of independence of, that aggregation of human vultures denominating themselves by such titles as the Brewers of America, the Wholesale Liquor Distillers, the Wholesale and Retail Liquor Dealers' Association of the United States, the Model License League, the Personal Liberty League, and so forth.

I thank God to have lived to see this day, when the Representatives of the American people will answer on the roll call with their votes the entreaties and imploring prayers of millions of country-serving, God-fearing, home-loving men and women. This day, O men, we who hold high station can dedicate one vote to liberty, country, God, and home, and rededicate the Constitution to the people, withdrawing it forever as a bulwark for that conglomeration of cormorants who, in defiance of the States, debauch manhood, slaughter womanhood, butcher childhood, and crucify babyhood on the accursed cross of alcohol. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, in the three minutes that I have, I desire to make but two observations. The first is that it is admitted by the Antisaloon League of America, in asking for this legislation, that the great mass of legislation that they have spread upon the statute books in the various States is an absolute failure in carrying out what they intended to carry out. I want to make the further observation that this sham and pretense of a prohibition law is about to be written upon the statute books of this Nation because the leaders of the Antisaloon League have so decreed. This House stands ready, if they will give the word, to write upon the statute books of this country a real prohibition law. Some of the Democratic leaders upon this side of the House, before the election, thought that this was a very dangerous question to discuss in the American Congress, but since the election they have seen fit to lead us into the Prohibition Party. And, as a real Democrat, in order that the real sincere temperance people of this Nation may write upon the statute books of this country what they have been told that this law means, I propose to vote for the Davis amendment, so that there can be real temperance prohibition legislation in the country. And I also say that the failure of this legislation is because the leaders of the Antisaloon League of America have deceived the people back home, and have come here to the American Congress and asked the Representatives to write a sham and a pretense of prohibition upon the statute books of the Nation. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, while those in favor of this bill honestly believe that they are doing something in the cause of prohibition, yet, as a matter of fact, legislation of this character generally leads to human ills compared to which drunkenness is nothing. [Applause.]

Overindulgence in anything is bad for whomsoever is guilty of the practice. One can overeat himself just as easily as one can overdrink himself. Thousands of people die annually on account of overindulgence in eating. Every doctor will tell you that that is a fact. The efforts to curb human appetite have been many. I doubt whether they have always resulted in benefit to the human race.

Physicians tell us that the drug evil in this country is growing by leaps and bounds. Personally, I firmly believe that legislation of this character is largely responsible for it. You find thousands of young men and young women all over this land who have become morphine fiends, opium fiends, and cocaine fiends largely because the right to take less harmful stimulants has been denied them by legislation. There are hundreds of thousands of good men and women, many of whom belong to strong temperance organizations, who partake of drugs that contain infinitely more alcohol than is contained in beer, wine, cider, and even whisky. This is by no means an overstatement of the case. Many of the patent medicines that are sold to the public for certain ailments contain large percentages of alcohol, and the use of these remedies is sometimes much more harmful than would be indulgence in malt and vinous liquors.

The Government has passed stringent laws against the importation of opium. What has been the consequence? It is constantly being smuggled into the country, and I doubt whether there has been any diminution in the vice of opium smoking.

The abolition of the Army canteen has brought greater evils to the soldiers of this country than were ever visited upon them in the days when they were able to procure light wine and beer in their canteens. [Applause.] On January 9, 1913, the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives had a hearing upon a bill to restore the Army canteen in the Army. There appeared before that committee urging its restoration the Secretary of War, the Surgeon General of the United States Army, the statistician in the office of the Surgeon General of the Army, the Chief of Staff of the Army, and other prominent officers who have had much experience in the military establishment of our Government both before and since the abolition of the canteen. Among the latter was Brig. Gen. Clarence R. Edwards, who stated that there is just getting into the service in a slight degree the use of cocaine. He said that he was much surprised to find a few cases of it in the service and that it was growing; that the man who becomes addicted to the disease generally gets his soldier pal likewise to participate in it.

Here is the statement of Gen. W. W. Wotherspoon, of the General Staff Corps, found on pages 15 and 16 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs:

Mr. WOTHERSPOON. My statement before the committee will have to be very brief. I think all the points have been thoroughly covered by the Secretary of War, Gen. Wood, and the Surgeon General. The only thing that may be of interest to the committee is that I was one of the originators of the canteen system in the Army. In 1878 the first canteen that I knew of was established by the Twelfth Infantry in Arizona on a petition by the enlisted men for the officers to give them an opportunity to get amusement away from the town of Prescott, Ariz., where hard liquor and all those other inducements to get away with the money of the men predominated to such an extent that the men wanted their clubs at the post. The first effort was to have the canteen without beer. They had little oyster suppers and sandwiches and coffee and billiards and various amusements, and we found that attracted a large class of the men, reduced the trials by court-martial very materially, and improved the discipline. But there was a residue of the men we could not control in that way. It was too mild for them, and it appeared they still wanted to go to saloons. So on the petition of the men and after a meeting of the noncommissioned officers of the regiments we, with great hesitation, introduced beer.

In connection with the spread of disease in the Army as a result of the abolition of the canteen, my experience was pretty large at one of the largest western posts. I had occasion—several occasions—to make a very careful investigation of the offenses committed by the men, and that brought me into direct contact with the class of dives and brothels that have been referred to here. I never have seen in my life anything so disgusting, so depraved, as those were. Among the men this class of dives was divided into two groups—the red and the green light. The red light was a place where liquor alone was sold of very vile character, but compared to the other place, the green-light district, it was a gentleman's club. At those places there was a barroom in front where the men believe they got knockout drops almost with the first drink. There were stalls in an extension of the building, where women, mostly negroes of the vilest type, had their habitations and extended their grasp over the soldiers. A man would go down after pay day and get into one of those green-light places. He would remember he had one or two drinks, also that he started in with $40 or $60 in his pockets, and he would be out in the hands of the police at the end of three days. He was generally found in some freight car.

It is exceedingly interesting and ought to commend itself to the consideration of every Member of this House who believes in true temperance: Prohibition has never yet made for temperance. On the contrary, it creates sneaks and liars and hypocrites. I said that the abolition of the Army canteen has brought greater evils to the soldiers of this country than were ever visited upon them in the days when they were able to procure light wine and beer in the canteens.

So-called social diseases are more numerous in the Army and the Navy of the United States than in any of the other armies of the world. Our country is practically the only one in the world which does not have the canteen or something of a corresponding nature. The presence of these diseases to such a great extent is a most appalling condition of affairs. Some of these diseases are transmitted even to the third and fourth generation, when the soldier marries. Paresis and locomotor ataxia are directly attributed to one of the loathsome forms of these diseases. I had a most distressing case called to my attention only a few weeks ago. A soldier had contracted this loathsome disease and subsequently married. He became the father of two beautiful children. About six years ago, which was some years after the disease had been contracted prior to his marriage, he was suddenly stricken with paresis. He left his wife and children absolutely helpless. The War Department refused to give him a pensionable status on the ground that his disease was contracted outside the line of his duty. And I dare say there are hundreds of similar cases throughout the country.

In the old days, before Congress abolished the canteen, soldiers were permitted to have beer and light wine in the canteen building. Overindulgence was never permitted. The soldiers, looking upon the canteen as a sort of a club for social enjoyment, would be content to remain at the military post practically all the time.

It has been testified to by many officers that since Congress passed the law to abolish the canteen the soldiers take leaves of absence and visit the lowest brothels in the vicinity of the post. Does anyone believe that any real good has been accomplished by the congressional enactment which abolished the canteen? Even the wives of officers appeared before the Military Committee urging that that institution be restored.

I call attention to the matter merely to show that legislation of the character that is now pending before the House frequently does greater damage than good.

In my own State the wine industry is a very considerable one. It represents an investment of $150,000,000; 350,000 acres of land are devoted to grape culture in that State; 60,000 people are engaged in the business, most of whom are small farmers. It is the third largest agricultural industry in the State of California.

I believe that the moderate use of wine leads to true temperance. In the wine-growing countries of Europe, where the people indulge moderately in the fermented juice of the grape, there is comparatively little drunkenness. In the beer-drinking countries of Europe there is comparatively little drunkenness.

The true way to minimize the evils of intemperance is to begin with the education of the children. The evils of drunkenness should be pointed out to them in the home or even in the schools. I think that would be a much more effective remedy in the cause of true temperance than legislation of this character, and, so believing, I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is recognized.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, for years and years a certain few States, and in the last few years a few others, have endeavored to stop the use and sale of liquor in the respective Commonwealths, and now, after these many years, they admit that they have been unable to do so, and are here to-day demanding that the Federal Government assist in enforcing this unreasonable and unwise State legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I never have, neither do I now, favor any special or sumptuary legislation. I do not believe in legislating for any especial district or any especial State; our duty is to legislate for this entire country of ours. Some people wonder why it is that these States have been unable to enforce their prohibition laws; to me it is plain, as it should be to anyone who recognizes the fact that you can not by law govern human nature and the tastes and inclinations of the individual.

You can no more legislate sobriety into a man than you can legislate good morals into him. These States have failed signally in the enforcement of their laws, the same as any other States would fail, for such laws are impossible of enforcement.

As for myself, I desire to say that, even were it possible to enforce prohibition, it would be unfair and unjust, because a majority should never be permitted to deprive the minority of the people of their personal rights and personal privileges, as these rights were given them by our Constitution. If an oppressive majority had the right to say how a man should live and what he should drink, they would also have the right to prescribe what he should eat, what he should wear, what church he should attend, or how many hours he might sleep.

We are to-day asked to legislate to aid these seven or eight so-called "prohibition" States in enforcing their laws, and some gentlemen coming from these States have endeavored to make us believe that this demand is country wide, yet anyone who studies the conditions will easily ascertain that this demand comes only from a few sections and from a few rabid, misguided, professional prohibitionists. I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the demand for this legislation has been artificially created by false statistics and untruthful literature, and I deny that drunkenness is responsible for misery and want, and assert that the reverse is true; that misery, want, misfortune, and the unnatural conditions brought about by prohibition are conducive to drunkenness. This legislation is not demanded by the majority of our people nor by those people who have given this question careful consideration. The truth is that some honest and well-meaning individuals, who are nevertheless narrow-minded and prejudiced, have become unduly alarmed over this problem and are seeking to force their views and beliefs upon this country as a whole and endeavoring to compel the great majority of the people to view the question and its solution as they do.

Mr. Speaker, we are asked to enact this legislation on the ground that the prohibitory laws passed by the various States have failed of their intended effect because of the shipment of alcoholic liquors into those States. The police powers of the States have been reserved to them, and it is manifestly the duty of every State to exercise the powers it has to stop the use of liquor before calling for Federal aid. The reason for the failure of these prohibition States to enforce their laws is that they do not really wish to enforce them.

Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the fact that a wave of prohibition seems to be rolling over certain States, yet I am bold enough to assert that this fact does not constitute an argument for the legislation by Congress at which this bill aims. Waves of alleged reform have heretofore swept communities, whole countries even, and after uprooting industries and impoverishing thousands, have vanished, leaving to saner influences the resuscitation of the things they have sought to destroy. There is a class of reform, so called, which in the last analysis is nothing but persecution. Its nomenclature varies with the period of its existence. In the days of Philip II of Spain reform found its advocates in the Alvas and the Torquemadas, who sought to reform all that were not of their faith by putting them to the sword or burning them at the stake. In our own country, up in New England, where prohibition has found a strong lodgment in the State of Maine, and with results not at all in keeping with the efforts put forth, it was a pleasant pastime a century or two ago to attempt reform by drowning those who were not in sympathy with the views of those in control. I merely cite these instances in order to show to what extremes reformers may go when they attempt to force their ideas upon those who do not agree with them.

We should beware how we bow to the present outbreak of intemperate assault upon vested law, for it involves a far greater menace to constitutional liberty than does the use of alcoholic drinks to society. In the one instance the danger is voluntary; to attempt to cure the evil by the commission of a greater wrong is futile in the extreme.

Mr. Speaker, it is a known fact that prohibition does not prohibit; in fact not only does it not prohibit, but it creates conditions that are responsible for many violations of the law and it breeds disregard for our entire judicial system. Statistics will show that there is more drunkenness in so-called "prohibition" States than in the States which have reasonable regulations. The statistics also show that there are many more illicit distilleries in those few States which have enacted prohibition legislation than in all those others which seek not to prevent its sale but to properly regulate it. To prove my contention I wish to read and insert as a part of my remarks extracts from the report of the Internal-Revenue Commissioner for the years 1911 and 1912. In his report for 1911 he said:

> A large number of the field force have been used during the year in detecting illicit distilling, which practice has increased steadily, especially in those States in which prohibitory laws have been enacted.

Please notice that he states that illicit distilling has increased steadily, "especially in those States in which prohibitory laws have been enacted." Is not this sufficient proof that these laws have not had the effect of prohibiting the use of liquor, but instead been the direct cause of increased disregard of the law?

Then, again, in this gentleman's report for 1912, he says:

Illicit distilling and "bootlegging" continue without sign of abatement. * * * It appears in some sections of the country, where local prohibitory officers make some effort to enforce local prohibitory laws, there is a correspondingly greater demand for illicit whisky, and as the price goes up more persons are willing to run the risk in violating the law. The tax on the entire amount of spirits aggregates a large amount of revenue that is lost to the Government, and represents a tremendous disturbing element and a great amount of lawlessness in communities, many of which are otherwise law-abiding and respecting.

Once again I wish to direct the attention of the gentlemen who are supporting this Webb bill and other prohibition measures that this State legislation has not been successful in prohibiting the use of liquor, but has instead encouraged illicit distilling.

Let me cite right here an instance of prohibition of another kind. In the State of Indiana a few years ago a law was passed prohibiting the sale of cigarettes. I have been informed, and I believe what I have been told, that the use of cigarettes in that particular Commonwealth has been not at all lessened by virtue of this prohibitory legislation. Unless I am greatly mistaken, similar attempts to prohibit the sale of these little "coffin nails" have been made elsewhere, but I have not learned that they have been attended with any better success.

Mr. Speaker, I never have been, and am not now, a believer in the excessive use of liquor, and I deplore as much as anyone the fact that some individuals are not at all times capable of curbing their desires, but at the same time I say that it is absolutely impossible to enact legislation which will make men abstain from the use of liquor in some form or other. What I favor is the enactment of strict legislation governing its sale, the imposition of heavy penalties for the violation of these regulations, the reservation to the States, counties, and municipalities, of complete control over the business as well as over the individuals conducting it, and providing for the immediate revocation of the licenses or permits of any individuals who violate the law. I feel confident that if these prohibition States would enact such legislation and would elect or select officials who would honestly exert reasonable efforts to see that such laws were enforced, that they would reduce drunkenness to a minimum, and also save their citizens the disgrace of perjuring themselves whenever they desire to secure a sip of liquor, as is now a common occurrence.

Then let us consider for a minute what would be the effect were we to close all the saloons throughout the United States, legislate out of existence all the breweries and all the distilleries that may exist there, and give the respective States jurisdiction over interstate commerce. Should this be done it would mean that illicit stills will spring up like mushrooms, "blind pigs" will flourish, bootlegging will be rampant, and those individuals desiring liquor will procure it in large quantities and drink a great deal more than they do when it can be purchased openly and legitimately. Surely we ought to take a lesson from the experience of our Army. Every officer bears witness to the fact that since the abolition of the post canteen drunkenness among the soldiers has increased tremendously, and with it all the attendant evils of disease, deterioration of discipline, and desertion. Have we the right to expect better results from those individuals who are not under military control?

There is another aspect of this question which I desire to have you consider. Millions of dollars are invested in the industries of brewing and distilling; what compensation will the Government hold out to those whose fortune is thus swept away, and what further compensation will Congress hold out to the thousands who have found employment in these industries and in this business, and the support of whose families is dependent upon their continuance therein? It is easily seen that the economic ramifications involved in the enactment of such legislation as is urged in this and similar bills is endless, and no man can foresee its ultimate effect.

Mr. Speaker, I presume no one, not even the most rabid prohibitionist, will deny the fundamental right of a person to take a glass of beer, a glass of wine, or a glass of whisky, or, in fact, any beverage which he may choose to enjoy, nor will anyone deny that the harm lies not in the use of this right but in its abuse. If these prohibition advocates would address themselves to finding a remedy for the immoderate use of stimulants, they would enlist under their banners hundreds of thousands of men in this country who now oppose them.

If Federal interference can regulate the drinking habits, not only of a community, but of the individual, what is there to prevent some future Congress, in which there may possibly be a large number of vegetarians, from passing a law forbidding the transportation of meat, for the advocates of a vegetarian diet assert that meat is most harmful, and that it tends to brutalize those indulging in it? Then, again, why not legislation prohibiting the use of teas and coffee? It is admitted that the stimulating qualities of these beverages are such as to render them very injurious when indulged in excessively. Then, too, if you pass a bill prohibiting the transportation of liquor you will shortly be implored to pass similar legislation having for its object the restriction of the use and transportation of tobacco. In fact, think of the precedent that would be set by the passage of this measure. This body would immediately be overwhelmed with demands for the passage of every conceivable kind of sumptuary legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to bring up the question of unconstitutionality, but I can not refrain from directing the attention of the Members of this House to the following ruling of the Supreme Court in the case of In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 562), where it was held that—

It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State.

And also the cases of Leisey v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), and American Express Co. v. State of Iowa (195 U. S. 133), where it was held that the citizen of one State has the right to import liquor from another State.

I also desire to call the attention of my colleagues to the opinion of Joel Prentiss Bishop, one of America's greatest law writers, who, in his book on "Statutory crimes," has the following to say with regard to the constitutionality of such legislation:

Now, as everyone is aware, while large classes of people hold that alcohol as a beverage is detrimental, others do not. And it is reasonable to inquire whether, when they of the affirmative become the majority of a State, it is within the rightful province of legislation to punish the men who furnish to the minority what they deem essential to their health and happiness. * * * Assuming all the worst things said against intoxicating drinks to be true, it is still the natural and inalienable right of every sane and capable person arrived at majority to procure them. * * * The drinks which a minority of the people deem essential, however pernicious we assume them to be in fact and however condemned by the majority, can not be altogether thrust by law beyond the practical reach of those who desire them without violating fundamental and indispensible principles of legislation.

Now, any comment that I might make on the above could add nothing to it, but I submit the words of this eminent authority as deserving of the most profound consideration.

Mr. Speaker, are we to now abandon the Constitution or to inaugurate a gradual process of disintegration by which this instrument is to be destroyed? Are we to distrust liberty and inaugurate governmental supervision of the citizens?

I feel that I have but imperfectly pointed out the dangers that lie concealed in this bill and other similar measures, but I trust that my efforts have been of some avail, and that my colleagues in this House will show their disapproval of legislation of this character by decisively defeating the measure now under consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. McCOY. And I, Mr. Speaker—how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield half a minute, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is constitutional. I believe it is wise. It does not diminish the authority of the Federal Government. It does enlarge local control, and I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

I shall support the legislation because I am in sympathy with the object sought to be accomplished, to wit: To remove as far as possible the obstacles which the interstate shipment of intoxicating liquor present in the enforcement of State laws regulating or prohibiting the liquor traffic, and because, in my opinion, it is in harmony with our plan of government under the Constitution. The control of Congress over interstate commerce is complete and may extend to actual prohibition, at least within certain limits, as is illustrated by the antilottery legislation and has frequently been declared by the courts, but I do not think it is necessary to go to the extreme of holding that this power is complete to the point of prohibition in all cases to defend this legislation as being constitutional. What the legislation does is to subject certain articles in interstate commerce to the police power of the State in order that the State authorities may determine whether they are to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used in violation of the law of the State.

This may be said to be a relinquishment by Congress of a portion of its control over interstate commerce. Taking that view of it, I do not think it can be successfully maintained that Congress has not a right to do so if it deems wise. The full control could, of course, be asserted at any time. What Congress really does in this legislation, however, is to authorize the use of the machinery of a State for the purpose of determining whether an article shipped into a State is, in fact, a legitimate article of interstate commerce. If the article proves to be contraband under the laws of the State, the protection of interstate commerce is denied it. We have many legislative enactments the force and efficiency of which are dependent upon their harmonious relation to State statutes. The act providing for the publicity of campaign contributions, certain provisions of the pure-food laws, and of the bankruptcy laws, recognizing and relating to State statutes, are cases in point.

This legislation ought to be—I believe will be—helpful in enabling the States in enforcing their laws regulating the liquor traffic. I am glad that a way has been found to accomplish this worthy purpose entirely in harmony with our plan of government. It particularly appeals to me, because it gives a wider opportunity for the exercise of local authority without encroaching upon the proper domain of Federal authority. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to this debate with much interest and some curiosity. I have seen in the course of it distinguished Members of this House who are opposed to the passage of the bill dress their arguments in every kind of garb. Some oppose it, saying that it is unconstitutional; others, that it destroys "individual liberty"; others, that it allows the prohibition States to dictate to the wet States as to what they shall or shall not do; and still others say that it will prevent wines being brought into the prohibition States for sacramental purposes.

No doubt some of these arguments are made in good faith. I can understand how lawyers may differ as to its constitutionality. In my opinion that is the only argument that can be reasonably advanced and that demands serious consideration. There is always a close question of law when we try to legislate within the limits of the indistinct twilight zone that separates the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and the jurisdiction of the States. And in this instance, while I may have some doubt as to the constitutionality of the bill and some uncertainty as to its being upheld by the courts, I shall certainly resolve that doubt in behalf of those States the desire and will of whose people cry out for this legislation.

It was indeed interesting to listen to some of the arguments presented by the distinguished apostles of individual liberty—some coming from the hop-scented atmosphere of St. Louis, where Anheuser-Busch brews and flourishes—while others from that great prohibition city of Milwaukee, made famous by Messrs. Pabst, Schlitz, Gatz, Blatz, and socialism—say that individual liberty is destroyed and that State sovereignty is impaired by the passage of this bill. And they are so extremely solicitous about the welfare of the moral people in the prohibition States that they fear the passage of this bill will prevent the Christian people in those States from observing the holy sacrament hereafter.

O, Mr. Speaker, the people know who are the champions of the antiprohibition movement in this country and its defenders in this House. They know, too, that to-day on the final vote, those champions and defenders will, under the guise of strengthening the bill, vote for the passage of many amendments which on their face may appear just and right, but behind which dynamite has been placed with a lighted fuse to explode and destroy the whole bill. The advocates of this bill will not take orders from its opponents, but prefer to follow the beaten path that its framers have made.

There is no question of individual liberty involved in the passage of this bill. It will not prevent liquors from being brought into prohibition States and being used for lawful purposes. There is nothing in this bill that will prevent the good Christian people of the prohibition States from getting all the wine they desire and using it for sacramental purposes, and no one knows this better than the gentlemen who say it destroys individual liberty and impairs sacramental privileges.

This is not a prohibition question. If I were not in favor of prohibition, there is one great principle of free government involved that would cause me to vote for the passage of this bill. Nine States have declared by a majority of the people living in them that intoxicating liquors in those State shall not be sold or used in violation of the law in those States. Laws, when made, should be enforced or repealed, and every arm of the State government should be used in the enforcement of the people's laws, and the Federal Government should never give countenance and sanction to the violation of the laws of any State. Certainly no man on this floor would say that if the people of Maine desire prohibition that they should not be permitted to have it. If Missouri wants liquor distilled and sold there, then they should be allowed to have it. If that be true, then certainly you will agree with me that the people of Missouri ought not desire to violate the laws of Maine, but on the contrary, every law-abiding citizen of that State should prefer to encourage the people of Maine in the execution of their laws. The Representatives of the people of Missouri and every other State in the Union that legalizes the sale and use of intoxicating liquors can certainly assist the people of the prohibition States in the enforcement of their laws by voting for this bill, which will gurantee to those States the control of this matter and the exclusive right to execute its own laws.

This bill does not express a radical idea. It is not extreme. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee, and those who have framed this legislation and looked into it thoroughly, tell us that under the decisions of the courts construing former acts of Congress on the subject and the limitation of the Federal Constitution, that it is the best we can do and as far as we can go.

Strange is the argument used by some against this bill. Why, they say "that it will do no good," that "it will accomplish no purpose." If that be true, why, then, do they oppose it? In my opinion, it will do a great deal of good. It is not for the purpose of getting the Federal Government to assist the States in the enforcement of their laws, as some contend, but it will answer the purposes for which it was intended, and that is, to give the States the unhampered, unimpeded, and exclusive power to enforce their own liquor laws.

When our fathers framed this Government the most enthusiastic and earnest proponents of a strongly centralized Government would not have contended that each State should not be free to regulate and execute its own police powers. They never dreamed that the champions of the liquor interests would ever hide behind the interstate-commerce clause and thereby let the Federal Government encroach upon the police powers of a State. And, Mr. Speaker, if any of those gentlemen in the Constitutional Convention, in their wildest dreams of imagination could have suggested or even hinted, that ever in the future, the interstate-commerce clause could be used to obstruct justice in the enforcement of laws by any State or to limit the morals of the people of any State or hinder the full exercise of the will of the people of a sovereign State, then the interstate-commerce clause would never have been written into the Constitution without a proviso making clear the intention of its draftsmen. I do not doubt that the framers knew what they were about, but I do doubt that they ever dreamed that new nationalism, centralization, and Federal encroachment would so expand and the Constitution be so construed as to bring about such conditions as would prevent the States from the enforcement of their police powers.

I represent in part a State the great majority of whose people believe in prohibiting the sale and unlawful use of intoxicating liquors. The sentiments of these people are behind the movement. The best liquor laws of which I have any knowledge are on the statute books of my State. The juries indict and convict the violators of those laws quicker when proven guilty than for any other crime, yet, Mr. Speaker, I have seen justice thwarted, permitting notorious blind tigers to infest a law-abiding community, not because the officers of the law were not doing all in their power to run the blind tigers down, but because they were protected by the Federal Government, which allowed them to have their liquors consigned to them in the depot to remain in safety until the darkness and stillness of the night when they could procure their large consignment and convey it to their den of vice and immorality. If this bill passes, the officers of the States can seize the liquors before they are delivered to the blind tiger and thereby prevent the deadly poison from infesting the community, from making sad homes and hungry children. I have seen, Mr. Speaker, in my own city, the officers watch the express offices and freight offices for days and nights trying to catch and seize a great quantity of liquor, which they knew was not for personal use, but for sale after it had been delivered to the consignee by the interstate carrier, but the bootlegger and blind tiger are always too cunningly alert and immorally smart. They know every policeman and detective, and the sentiments of every man in the community—their sympathizers and their enemies—and they wait their time with patience, sometimes until the wee hours of the morning in order to obtain their liquors from these offices. If this law be passed the express and freight offices can be watched, and these liquors, when brought into prohibition States for illegal purposes, can be immediately seized and destroyed, and the community will be blessed thereby.

When we ask this right, who should oppose it? The people of a State have a right to demand that their laws be enforced. Good citizens of every State will sympathize with their brethren in other States in the enforcement of their laws.

If the liquors are received for personal use they will not be destroyed, and only the lawbreakers, bootleggers, blind tigers, and their sympathizers in my State and other prohibition States can possibly find objection to the passage of this bill, and only the distillers, liquor sellers, brewers, and their sympathizers in other parts of the country will oppose it.

The gentleman from Milwaukee [Mr. BERGER] says that the violation of the law has increased in the South since the advent of prohibition. I interrupted the gentleman for a question when he made that statement, but he declined to yield. Surely he does not desire to do the prohibition States of the South an injustice, and I am sure that this statement was made because of his ignorance of the conditions there rather than a desire on his part to misrepresent the condition there. I will not attempt to speak on this question of an increase in crime since the advent of prohibition in the other States of the South, but coming, as I do, from Mississippi, a State that has within the last 10 years seen the open saloon and its effect and statutory prohibition and its influence, I feel that I can truly depict to this House the conditions in that State before and since the enactment of a State-wide prohibition law.

I served for two years as district attorney in one of the districts of my State where three of the counties had open saloons and legally sold liquors. I served for three years in the same district with those three counties under the statutory prohibition law and when the open saloon had been abolished—for five years in the courts of those counties, two years of which there were saloons and three years of which we had prohibition—and during that time I came directly in touch with the character and extent of crime that followed the open saloon and prohibition. During the two years that these three counties legalized the sale of liquor, Mr. Speaker, the criminal dockets were so congested that it was impossible to try all of the cases thereon, and necessitated not only holding the courts for their full terms, but often forced the circuit judge to call special terms to relieve the dockets. After prohibition came into those counties and was fairly tried out the dockets were no longer congested, special terms of court no longer were known, and the full length of the terms assigned for holding of those courts were no longer required. And what I have described relative to the extent of crime in those counties under the open saloon and prohibition holds good in practically the same proportion with respect to the character of crime.

Murder, poverty, unhappy homes, divorces, and broken hearts follow as a natural consequence the open saloon, while prohibition lessens murders, alleviates poverty, restores sunshine in unhappy homes, mends broken hearts, diminishes divorces, elevates and enlightens a people, and only by the presence of the bootlegger and the blind tiger does prohibition cause a violation of the law.

Where a reasonable majority, backed by public sentiment, are for prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, prohibition should prevail. If the minority of the people of a State, backed by no sentiment for prohibition, should desire to place it upon the people of a State, it should not prevail. No law can be enforced unless a reasonable majority of the people of the State are in favor of it and it is backed by the sentiment of the people. But when the people of a State, as in my State, favor overwhelmingly the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors, it is unfair to them that the Federal Government should allow the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to be invoked and used as an instrument to hinder them in the enforcement of their laws.

I hope this bill will pass and that the hand of the Federal Government will be removed from the throats of some of the States, so that they may be permitted to enforce the will of their people in their own way, unmolested, unhindered, and unobstructed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I shall favor this bill and vote against all except committee amendments which may be proposed. I do this not because I believe the bill as reported is entirely perfect, but because I know that the effect of any amendment will be to delay all legislation on the subject and possibly defeat the bill. The bill is a very simple one. Nobody can possibly misunderstand or misinterpret its plain and manifest meaning. It provides simply that intoxicating liquors shall not be transported from one State to another where the intention of anybody connected with the transaction is to use or possess the liquor so transported, in violation of the laws of the State into which the liquor is shipped. The contention that the advocates of the bill are endeavoring to induce the Federal Government to enact prohibition legislation is, with all due respect to those who make it, mere twaddle. Nobody believes that the Federal Government has any power to enact prohibition laws for the States, and nobody desires the Federal Government to undertake the exercise of any such power. The question of the sale and use of intoxicating liquors is a matter that should be dealt with exclusively by the States. This bill recognizes that principle and has for its purpose nothing else. It leaves the burden of regulating the liquor traffic entirely and exclusively with the legislatures of the several States, and says for the Federal Government simply that such liquors shall loose their character as interstate commerce. This is done for the sole and only reason that the State authorities may not be hampered in the enforcement of their police regulations by reason of these liquors being part of interstate commerce and as such beyond the power of the State's control.

If any State should desire, through its authorized agents, the lawmaking branch of its Government, to outlaw the possession of intoxicating liquors within its borders, this is certainly a matter that would not and could not concern the Federal Government. It would be none of our business; and "in that spirit of harmony and conciliation which"—to use the words of the Supreme Court of the United States—"ought always to characterize the conduct of governments, standing in the relation which that of the Union and those of the several States bear to each other," we ought to enact such laws as will aid in the enforcement of State laws, if that can be done under the Constitution. Gentlemen hark back to "the better days of the Republic," and in the name of the fathers who framed our Constitution call upon us not to ask the Federal Government to invade the sanctity of State sovereignty. We are told that we are departing from the principles which inspired those who framed our dual system of government and that it is humiliating now to see these great States acknowledging their inability to conduct their own affairs and calling upon the Federal Government for aid. This is mere buncombe. We are doing no more in this bill than has been done from time to time since the foundation of the Republic. As far back as 1796 Congress enacted—

> That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to direct the revenue officers and the officers commanding forts and revenue cutters to aid in the execution of quarantine and also in the execution of the health laws of the States, respectively, in such manner as may to him appear necessary. (Stat. L., Vol. I, p. 474.)

This act was approved by George Washington himself. But we are sometimes told that Washington was a Federalist, so lest some may insist in a spirit of partisanship that a Democrat may overlook such a precedent, I read from volume 2 of the Statutes at Large, page 205:

> An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited.

This statute was enacted in 1803 and was approved by Thomas Jefferson. I think these citations are sufficient answer to the suggestion that we are departing from the faith of the fathers here to-day. But whatever opinion may have been held of the constitutionality of these old statutes which I have just read, the one signed by Washington and the other signed by Jefferson, the Supreme Court of the United States long ago upheld them both in the great case of Gibbons against Ogden, decided in 1824. These statutes were assailed as unconstitutional. Gentlemen here to-day insist with great earnestness that this bill is an attempt to delegate to the States the right to regulate interstate commerce. This identical contention was urged against the very statutes that I have read. In passing upon that subject the greatest judge who ever sat upon any bench in any country in the tide of time said (9 Wheat., 205):

> The acts of Congress passed in 1796 and 1799 (U. S. Stat., 474, 619), empowering and directing the officers of the General Government to conform to and assist in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of a State, proceed, it is said, upon the idea that these laws are constitutional. It is undoubtedly true that they do proceed upon that idea; and the constitutionality of such laws has never, so far as we are informed, been denied. But they do not imply an acknowledgment that a State may rightfully regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the States; for they do not imply that such laws are an exercise of that power or enacted with a view to it. On the contrary, they are treated as quarantine and health laws, are so denominated in the acts of Congress, and are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State, to provide for the health of its citizens. But as it was apparent that some of the provisions made for this purpose, and in virtue of this power, might interfere with and be affected by the laws of the United States, made for the regulation of commerce, Congress, in that spirit of harmony and conciliation which ought always to characterize the conduct of governments standing in the relation which that of the Union and those of the States bear to each other, has directed its officers to aid in the execution of these laws; and has in some measure adapted its own legislation to this object by making provisions in aid of those of the States.

Under the ordinance relating to the slave trade the States had the right to prohibit "the migration or importation of such persons as they might think proper," and it is contended that the act of 1803, which Jefferson signed and which I have just quoted, was upheld on that theory. Very well; so be it; but I quote the statute to show that Congress believed then, at that early day, that the Federal Government had the power and that it was its duty to assist the States in the execution of such laws as the State itself had power to enact, and I invite your attention to the last section of this act of 1803, which is as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the collectors and other officers of the customs, and all other officers of the revenue of the United States, in the several ports or places situated as aforesaid, to notice and be governed by the provisions of the laws now existing of the several States prohibiting the importation of any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, as aforesaid. And they are hereby enjoined vigilantly to carry into effect the said laws of said States conformably to the provisions of this act, any law of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

The whole purpose of this bill is, as expressed in its title, "to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases" and to subject them to the police power of the States whenever they are shipped into a State with the criminal intention of violating its laws.

The rights of the so-called wet States are in no way infringed. They may manufacture, sell, possess, and consume intoxicating liquors to their hearts' content, but they can no longer claim protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution when they are brought to the bar of justice in another State into which they have shipped such liquors for the purpose and with the wicked intention of violating the laws of such State. Just how any Democrat who believes in local self-government and the right of every State under the Constitution to regulate its domestic affairs in accordance with its own will and judgment can vote against this measure passes my understanding. The merits of the contention of the prohibitionists or of the anti-prohibitionists are not an element in the consideration of this bill. It is none of our concern, and we are not undertaking to pass upon the wisdom or the unwisdom of prohibition law. It is not the propriety of the legislation but the right of the States to enact it that we are recognizing here to-day. We propose that the Federal Government shall, in the exercise of the powers conferred on Congress under the Constitution, be decent enough to withhold hereafter from all who wish to violate the laws of any State the right to use the vehicles of interstate commerce for that unholy purpose. Simply this and nothing more.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I desired to speak on the legal aspects of this question, and manifestly I can not do that in the time that has been allotted to me. Therefore I shall only say this, that I hope the amendments that have been offered to this bill will be voted down.

I have no doubt whatever as to the constitutionality of this law, and I shall vote for it, not as the exercise of an unjust power on the part of the Federal Government, but only as an acknowledgment of the power that the States should have to control their own affairs in the interests of their people. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] is recognized.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, the pending Webb bill I shall vote for, and shall vote against all amendments thereto, seeking thereby to aid in the passage of said bill, which seeks to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases. This bill, as reported from the Judiciary Committee of the House, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

I shall not discuss its constitutionality. Let the courts pass upon that question. The principle sought to be embodied in the bill I have long favored. I am an advocate of the right of the States to control their own domestic affairs and to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors unhampered by Federal laws, and I am opposed to all restraint or license on the part of Federal authority that would tend to break down the laws of the State seeking to control or regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Being opposed to the Federal Government licensing or issuing permits for sale of intoxicating liquors except to persons authorized under the laws of the State to sell, I introduced into this House a bill which reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2891) concerning permits to sell intoxicating liquors.

Be it enacted, etc., That no Federal authorization or permit to sell any intoxicating liquor in a State shall be given until it shall be satisfactorily shown that the applicant therefor may sell such liquor at the place designated for the sale thereof without violating any law of such State applicable to such place and sale, and no such authorization or permit shall extend to any sale not made openly, at the designated place of business of the applicant, and every such authorization or permit hereafter given shall contain suitable recitals showing compliance with the requirements of this act, and shall at all times be subject to the inspection of any Federal, State, county, or municipal officer; and every person guilty of a violation of this act shall be fined not less than $100 or be imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

This bill is now pending in committee, and I hope will be reported out, so it can be voted on in the House and become a law. It seeks to prevent the blind tiger and the bootlegger from selling with the consent of the Federal Government. The passage of this bill and the Webb bill will go a long way toward enabling the State to prevent illegal sales of liquor. These bills do not interfere with those authorized to sell under the laws of the State nor the collection of revenue by the Federal Government from those so licensed. The United States Government should aid in the preservation of the laws of the States rather than in their violation.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY] shall use all of his time.

Mr. MCCOY. How many more gentlemen are to speak on that side?

Mr. CLAYTON. Only two more. Mr. Speaker, I think I have only about eight minutes left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven and one-half minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. That was a pretty good guess.

Mr. MCCOY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized.

[Mr. LINTHICUM addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MCCOY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the denunciation of those temperate gentlemen who speak for temperance, I am one of those Members of this House who are opposed to this bill. I am opposed to it because I do not believe in such legislation; but I am opposed to it for the higher reason that I believe it fatally unconstitutional. And I am reminded by what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has said, that I find usually the denunciation of those who believe in supporting their oath touching the Constitution comes from those who know least of that document. [Applause.] There is an old saying that we resent that which we do not understand; and so it comes very easy to some to taunt others and tell them they are hobble-skirting themselves. I have no apology, however, for considering the question of constitutionality, and until the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] said there was no doubt, I had not found any good lawyer who said he did not think the subject was one of grave doubt. When the gentleman from Texas spoke I was reminded of the situation of the lawyer before the court, who, making a statement of law, was interrupted by the court, who said, "That is not the law." The lawyer replied, "It was until your honor spoke." And so, until the distinguished gentleman told us that there was no doubt as to the constitutionality of this law, all of us, even those who favored it, as well as those who opposed it, had grave doubts.

Within the three minutes granted me I shall not attempt to deal with the legal phases of a question that goes to the very vitals of the Constitution. I took occasion some eight years ago to discuss at length nearly every important decision that at that time had been rendered by the Supreme Court touching interstate shipments of alcoholic liquors. While I may not attempt to go into that subject at this time, I submit to you these, to me, fundamental propositions:

First, that the power over interstate commerce rests with the Federal Government, and an article does not lose its interstate character until delivered to a consignee.

Second, no power that the Federal Government has can be delegated to any State.

Third. It is not a Federal regulation of interstate commerce to prohibit it on the ground of an intent by any person party to the transaction to violate a State law as it may exist from time to time.

Man after man has stood on the floor here saying, "This bill is simply to give to the State additional power of control." I say to you that whatever power a State has over any subject within its domain is not because of the Constitution of the United States, and no act of Congress can grant any power to it that it does not already have. We live under a government of delegated powers. Certain powers have been delegated to the States, certain to the Nation, and certain reserved to the people, and delegated neither to the State nor to the Nation. The power that the Federal Government has over interstate commerce is plenary. It is absolute within the limits of the Constitution, and Congress can not by all the declarations under the sun convey to any single State the slightest power that that State does not now have. A State now has the power the moment a shipment has reached the hands of the consignee to deal with it the same as if it originated there. That ought to be of itself an ample power to enable the States properly to enforce every law that has back of it a united public opinion; and you will never enforce completely any law that does not have back of it a united public opinion.

Still they tell us that the effect of this is to give the State added control. What does the bill say? Does it even attempt to say that? It says the shipment is prohibited when the intent is to violate a State law. Let us suppose the shipment is made. What happens then? Does it lose its interstate character because you have said it should not be made in certain cases? By no process of reasoning am I able to bring myself to any such conclusion.

This law if passed will not, in my judgment, give to a single State the right to seize—though they will attempt to do it and will do it—any interstate shipment until it reaches the hands of the consignee.

Now, just one other word and I am through. I offered an amendment here in good faith to strike out the language that limited this bill to intoxicating liquors and make it apply to all articles of commerce; and assuming the proposed act to be constitutional, I defy any man to give a reason, if he plants himself on the ground that we ought not to enable anyone to violate a State law, why we ought not to make the law apply to any violation of any State law touching any article of commerce. I offered that amendment for another reason. I had hoped that we might have this matter considered as it ought to be considered, according to the legal questions that it presents. This bill does not become a constitutional or an unconstitutional bill because it relates to alcoholic liquors; and yet I could talk here until the crack of doom, and because it does relate to that subject I could not get a consideration of the constitutional question that every man under his oath of office promises to give to every subject that comes before this body. [Applause.]

Under the leave to extend my remarks I print a speech made by me before the Committee on the Judiciary in the Fifty-eighth Congress touching what was then known as the Hepburn-Dolliver bill—a bill which sought to amend the Wilson Act by adding the words "before or after delivery," so as to enable a State to seize an interstate shipment before delivery to a consignee. Much then said applies directly to the Webb bill. I also add the statements of Hon. Lawrence E. Maxwell, a former Solicitor General of the United States, touching the Webb bill, made before the present Committee on the Judiciary, also the statement of Mr. Edgar H. Gaus, an attorney of Baltimore, Md., touching an identical Senate bill made before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

These arguments supplement mine of eight years ago, and upon their soundness I submit the question of the constitutionality of the Webb bill.

The speech of mine above referred to is as follows:

"Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to be perfectly frank in saying that my attention to this bill and my original opposition to the bill grew out of the fact that I represent a district that is largely engaged in the manufacture and exportation of distilled spirits. Perhaps my congressional district is the largest district, in some respects, in the country. Certainly the Louisville market is the chief market of the world in regard to whiskies. But I would be equally unfair to myself and equally unfair to this committee if I was to base my opposition to this bill solely upon the ground that it affects alcoholic liquors.

"In my judgment, there is involved in this bill a proposition as fundamental and as far-reaching in regard to the organic nature of our Government, National and State, as any possible legislation, and this committee would not deserve its title of Judiciary Committee if it declined to consider, not simply the question of the advisability of a law of this kind, but the further and more fundamental question of the power of Congress to pass the law.

"It is an interesting fact that our present Government owes its existence largely to the trouble that grew up in the days of the old confederation in regard to interstate commerce. The Philadelphia convention, which adopted the present Constitution, was called into existence as a result of the labors of the Annapolis convention, which had itself been brought about by the original convention called by Maryland and Virginia to formulate some plan relative to commerce between those two States, and the provision giving Congress power over interstate and foreign commerce was put into the Constitution without practically any discussion, so apparent was the need of national control of commerce.

"Yet, strangely enough, from the beginning of the present Government down to this good hour there have been differences of opinion as to the power that was given to the National Government under that provision which says that Congress may regulate commerce with foreign nations, with the Indian tribes, and among the several States.

"One contention has been that the power of Congress was exclusive and left no power in the State. The other position has been that the power of Congress was not necessarily exclusive of the power in the States, and in the arguments and opinions dealing with these conflicting theories there has been an unfortunate use of a phrase, and that phrase is 'concurrent power.' There never has been, there never could be, such a thing as the concurrent power of the States and the Nation in regard to interstate commerce, and the decisions will amply bear out that statement. There has been, as to some subjects of interstate commerce, a subservient power in the State which was free to act until Congress did act itself. But if the powers were concurrent it would mean that the State power should not bow any more to the National power than the National power should bow to the State power. If there was such a thing as a concurrent power, the doctrine of the silence of Congress, which I shall come to in a moment, could have no force, because it would not matter whether Congress expressed its will or did not express its will. If the State's power was concurrent, it would follow that it was coequal and that both the State and the Nation could legislate and each would have the right to maintain that its law was to be enforced.

"The real contention and the real result of all the decisions, when you look not simply to what was said but to what was actually decided, is this: That where the question is one of a national nature, then the power of Congress is exclusive, but where the question is simply of a local nature, then there is power in the State to act, provided Congress has not by its own act governed the matter. In other words, when it comes to a question like pilotage or harbor regulations, then the State can go ahead and pass its law, and that law will be enforced until Congress undertakes to regulate in regard to such matters, and then the State law, even as to them, must bow to the national law, in accordance with that provision which makes a law passed in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States the supreme law of the land.

"I want to review very briefly a few of the cases decided by the Supreme Court to show, in a measure, just what was decided and what may be said to be the conclusions of the court at present.

"If I should undertake to read the decisions themselves, I would have to read some thousand pages, because there is at least that much printed matter on the specific questions involved in this case, without referring to the cases in regard to interstate commerce that had no relation to alcoholic liquors.

"In Gibbons against Ogden, which was the first case, and perhaps the most famous case of them all, the court decided this: That a State regulation of foreign or interstate commerce actually in conflict with a law of Congress is void.

"It was argued by Mr. Webster, and by all the counsel who were against the constitutionality of the State law, that the law would be void whether Congress had acted or not, and the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall goes to the extent of saying that since the power of Congress over interstate commerce is an exclusive power, that therefore the State law must be unconstitutional, irrespective of its conflict with a specific Federal law. But the exact point decided was not that. He said that it was not necessary to decide that point, because here was a case where the National Government had acted anyway and the State law was in conflict with the National law, and therefore there could be no doubt but that the State law was unconstitutional.

"In the case of Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 419), the court decided that a State law imposing a license to sell on an importer was unconstitutional, being in conflict with the Federal law. In that case also the reasoning of the court points to the inevitable and logical conclusion that the power of Congress is exclusive, and that the action of the State is necessarily unconstitutional; but in that case, as in the Gibbons against Ogden case, the exact point decided was that a law passed by a State actually in conflict with a law passed by Congress was unconstitutional and went no further. The dicta of both of those cases seems to be unanswerable in its logic that the power of Congress is exclusive, but I want to present what was decided and not what was said.

"The next case was the case of Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. (2 Pet., 245), and there, apparently, the Supreme Court reversed itself. It did not reverse itself in regard to the actual decisions, but the reasoning in that case is somewhat in conflict with the reasoning of the two former cases. There was a State law passed authorizing the erection of a dam across a navigable stream, and the advocates of the exclusive theory contended that that law was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that it was constitutional, on this ground: That the law related to that feature of interstate commerce which was not national in its character and which did not require a uniform rule, but which might be dealt with locally, and that in so far as Congress had not said anything, the State had the right to legislate; and right here I want to make this point plain. That the right of the State to so legislate is not owing to any right to regulate interstate commerce, but is the right that it has in other matters to legislate in regard to the territory over which its sovereignty extends; and the absence of national legislation simply leaves the State completely free to legislate as to the things within its domain, not by virtue of any power it has over interstate commerce, because it has none, but because of its other powers. In this particular case the legislation was upheld because relating to commerce only in its local aspects and not in conflict with any existing Federal law.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What justice delivered that opinion?

"Mr. SHERLEY. That decision was rendered by Justice Marshall, and, as I have said, was apparently a decision the reasoning of which was somewhat in conflict with the reasoning in the two former cases of Gibbons v. Ogden and Brown v. Maryland.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Were the other cases referred to, discussed, distinguished, and criticized?

"Mr. SHERLEY. They were distinguished. Commerce in this case was affected but locally and in the other cases fundamentally, and they were cases where Congress had acted; but the logic of those opinions, if carried out, perhaps might have suggested a different decision in the Blackbird Creek case.

"Then came the case of New York v. Miln (11 Pet., 102), which held that a law requiring masters of vessels to make a report of the name, place of birth, etc., of every person brought as a passenger unto the State of New York from other States or foreign countries, was constitutional, being the exercise of police power and not in any way regulating commerce. The court practically said in its dicta that the police power in the State is not limited or confined by the power of the National Government in regard to interstate commerce, but the facts of that case were simply this:

"The law required that masters should make a report of the passengers that came in as to who they were, so that the State might have some record in regard to immigration and might protect itself against pauper immigration, and the judges in deciding that case held—and it seems to me rightfully—that the act in question was in no way an interference with interstate commerce nor could be considered to really touch interstate commerce at all; that it was simply a regulation of a matter local entirely and not interstate or foreign.

"Then came the License cases (5 How., 504). In the License cases it was held that certain regulations of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island requiring a license to sell liquors imported from another State were valid. Each of the judges concurring in the judgment rendered delivered a separate opinion, and the reasons in support of the conclusion of the court are widely divergent. The chief question concerning which the judges differed was as to whether the regulations involved in that case were really regulations of interstate commerce or not. And it is to be noted that, in the opinion of several of the judges, the distinction is clearly drawn between a prohibition to import and a prohibition to sell after importation. Mr. Justice Woodbury, in his opinion, among other things, said:

"It is manifest, also, whether as an abstract proposition or practical measure, that a prohibition to import is one thing, while a prohibition to sell without license is another and entirely different. The first would operate upon foreign commerce on the voyage.

"The latter affects only the internal business of the State after the foreign importation is completed and on shore. The subject of buying and selling within the State is one as exclusively belonging to the power of the State over its internal trade as that to regulate foreign commerce is with the General Government under the broadest construction of that power. The idea, too, that a prohibition to sell would be tantamount to a prohibition to import does not seem to me either logical or founded in fact, for even under a prohibition to sell a person could import, as he often does, for his own consumption and that of his family and plantation, and, also, a merchant extensively engaged in commerce often does import articles with no view of selling them here, but of storing them for a higher or more suitable market in another State or abroad.

"He then states that the licenses involved in those cases were neither regulations of interstate commerce nor of foreign commerce, and holds that whether such laws are to be classed as police measures or as regulations of the internal commerce of the States, or as taxation merely, is immaterial so long as they do not affect interstate or foreign commerce until after the subject matter of that commerce touches the soil or waters within the limit of the State.

"I have called attention expressly to these views because the License cases in what they actually decide go perhaps as far as any case in the rights that they give to the State government to pass laws affecting interstate commerce, and yet it is apparent that there was noted a clear line of distinction between the right to sell and the right to import, a distinction that in my judgment is vital in considering the constitutionality of the proposed law. Some of the opinions, however, in the license cases are directly opposed in their reasoning to that set forth in Gibbons v. Ogden, and Brown v. Maryland.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Were those cases discussed and distinguished?

"Mr. SHERLEY. They were discussed in some three or four hundred pages, and a man can find an expression in these different cases as to any proposition in regard to interstate-commerce law that you want. I could take the time of this committee for hours reading an expression by one judge, who has reached the conclusion that the State had reached all of its powers, and another who has reached the conclusion that the National Government had stripped the State of every power; but it is not what the judges have said, but what they have decided, which constitutes the law of the land.

"Very shortly after the decision in the License cases came the Passenger cases (7 How., 283), which presented the question of the constitutionality of laws of the States of Massachusetts and New York requiring masters of vessels to pay to the health officers of the State board a certain sum for each passenger landed. The court held such laws unconstitutional and abandoned in a large measure the ruling laid down in the License cases and apparently adopted the doctrine of exclusive power of the National Government.

"Then came the case of Cooley v. Board of Wardens (12, How., 299), and this case is apparently a compromise between the position of those advocating exclusive national power and those advocating the reserved power of the States. The question presented was the constitutionality of the law of Pennsylvania establishing regulations of pilots and pilotage for the harbor of Philadelphia. The court sustained the validity of the State law and laid down this rule, which I believe to be a safe rule to follow to-day.

"When the nature of a power like this is spoken of, when it is said that the nature of the power requires that it should be exercised exclusively by Congress, it must be intended to refer to the subjects of that power and to say that they are of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Now, the power to regulate commerce embraces a vast field, containing not only many but exceedingly various subjects quite unlike in their nature, some imperatively demanding a single uniform rule, operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every port, and some, like the subject now in question, as imperatively demanding that diversity which alone can meet the local necessities of navigation. Either absolutely to affirm or deny that the nature of this power requires exclusive legislation by Congress is to lose sight of the nature of the subjects of this power and to assert concerning all of them what is really applicable but to a part. Whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit only of one uniform system or plan of regulation, may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress.

"If this rule is borne in mind and applied right on down through the various cases, you will find that a great deal of the difficulty caused by reason of the dicta of the court vanishes and is lost sight of. After that case was decided the old controversy was in a measure dropped, and the question that the court came to consider was as to the nature of the interstate commerce that the particular law affected, and if it was national they held that the State law could not be held to be constitutional, and if it was local they held that the State law was a valid exercise of the powers of the State.

"Then came the case of Bowman v. Railway Co. (125 U. S., 465), which expressly decided this question: That the shipment of alcoholic liquors from one State into another State could not be prevented by a State law. That was followed by the case of Leisly v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), which went a step further and followed up the doctrine which always had been the law in regard to foreign commerce, but which had expressly not been the law in regard to interstate commerce, that the right to import carried with it the right to sell. The Bowman case decided that you had the right to import and that the State could not interfere with it. Of course, at that time there was no national legislation warranting the State to interfere. You had the silence of Congress, and they held that the silence of Congress as to a national matter indicated that that commerce should remain free, whereas the silence of Congress as to a local matter indicated the will of Congress that the State might legislate. In other words, they gave just opposite meanings to the inaction of Congress according as the law involved related to a subject, local or national. The Bowman case decided expressly that the shipment of alcoholic liquor from one State to another could not be prevented by a State law, and then the Leisly case decided that not only could the importation not be prevented but that the sale could not be prevented.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In the original package?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir; and in deciding that they overruled the Pierce v. New Hampshire case, which was one of the License cases, and in that case the court, as I have just shown, held that the right to sell was not an inherent part of the right to introduce goods from one State into another. The Pierce case was directly opposed to the Brown v. Maryland case. The Brown case related simply to foreign commerce, whereas the Pierce case related to commerce between the States.

"The Leisly case held that commerce between the States was upon the exact same ground that foreign commerce was, and permitted not only the importation of but also the sale the first time in the original package. That decision, in my judgment, is open to severe criticism, and it did cause a great deal of criticism because of its failure to recognize the distinction between the right to sell and the right to import. I do not believe that it follows as a matter of logic, certainly in regard to interstate commerce, however it might be in regard to foreign commerce, that the right to import carries with it the right to sell. In foreign commerce that might be so, because the importer not having any reason to bring things into the country except for the purpose of selling them, his right to import would be practically annulled if you did not give him the right to sell, but in regard to interstate commerce that is not necessarily so.

"A man may want to import into a State for his own use without regard to his right to sell, and it seems to me that the right to sell is an incident and not a fundamental aspect of interstate commerce; and again I wish to say that if this committee will bear that in mind, that distinction between selling and the right of importation, they will come to the one point that, it seems to me, the whole proposed present law turns upon.

"The court, unfortunately, in those cases went to talking, and the judges said a good many things outside of what they decided. They decided exactly what I have said, but in deciding that, they intimated that Congress could break its silence and by an affirmative statement permit the State to do that which they had just decided it could not do before, an absolutely illogical position, because if the power of Congress was exclusive as to interstate commerce where the subject was national, it follows that by the very meaning of the word 'exclusive' there is carried the idea of an absence of power in the States; and Congress, as we all know, can not create power in the States. They may remove obstacles from the State rights to exercise another power, but they can not create a power in the State, and that has been decided repeatedly and needs no argument. The court however, said Congress could give permission, and Congress very quickly took advantage of that suggestion and passed the Wilson law.

"The Wilson law came up for construction as to its constitutionality and as to the constitutionality of the Iowa law in the Rahrer case, and the court in that case said a great deal, but did not decide very much. It decided this proposition: That Congress had the power to rob interstate commerce of its interstate character before the sale instead of allowing it to have that interstate character until after the sale. In other words, the effect of the Wilson bill was simply to put the law back where it was in regard to interstate commerce before the Leisly decision, that decision, as I have stated, having held as to interstate commerce that the right to import carried the right to sell. Congress, by the Wilson bill, put the law as to interstate commerce back where it was before that case was decided and said that the right to import did not carry the right to sell.

"Now, this law came up again before the Supreme Court in the Rhodes case, and there it was contended that the law not only prohibited the right to sell, but prohibited the right to import, and the Supreme Court decided that a proper construction of the words of the act limited it to the right to sell and did not touch the other right to import, and in deciding that case the court not only expressed the idea that it had not decided the constitutional question of whether if it had gone to the extent contended for it would have been constitutional, showing in the mind of the judge rendering that decision that there was a serious question as to such power being possessed by Congress, but it also makes a distinction which is very pertinent. It speaks of the right of sale as being an incident of interstate commerce, but not being one of the fundamental aspects of interstate commerce, the distinction that I made a few moments ago.

"In other words, it may be that Congress can say that we will, by affirmative legislation, decide that goods going into a State shall become intermingled with the rest of the property of the State so as to be subject to the State law at an earlier period than would happen ordinarily, but to say that Congress can say further that a State by its law shall be given the power to reach out into an adjoining State and prevent the goods of such State coming within its borders, and that a contract which has been made there shall not be enforced, is an entirely different proposition, and that is the proposition you are confronted with by the proposed law. That bill changes the present law to this extent, that it uses the words 'the boundary of' and then 'before and after delivery.' Those six or seven words are the only changes between the Wilson law as it now stands and this proposed law, excluding the second section, which is largely declaratory of the first.

"In other words, this is an effort to make the Wilson law mean what the advocates of the prohibition laws of Iowa contended it meant in the Supreme Court and what the Supreme Court decided it did not mean. What will be the effect of this law if passed? Of course one effect of the law, as has been stated by the gentleman who preceded me, would be to transfer the storm center from Washington to the various State capitals.

"Mr. THOMAS. Is it your contention that Congress has not the constitutional power to prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors from one State into another?

"Mr. SHERLEY. No, sir. I do not say that, because the Supreme Court has expressly decided the contrary in the Lottery case. The Supreme Court held that lottery tickets were articles of commerce, rather an unusual decision, but it is the law. They declared that a lottery ticket was an article of commerce, and, being such, the power of Congress to regulate included the power to prohibit; and I contend right here and frankly admit that you can write a national law which will prohibit the transportation of liquors; but that is not what you are trying to do under this bill. You are undertaking to lift the ban that is placed upon the States in regard to interstate commerce and permit them to legislate as to interstate commerce. If that be not the purpose of this bill, there is no use of passing it, because, under the law as it now stands and as construed in the Rahrer case, any State has the power the moment imported alcoholic liquors are delivered to the original consignee to treat them the same as if they had been manufactured in the State and not shipped in.

"In other words, they can say to the consignee, 'You shall not consume it; you shall not sell it; you shall not give it away.' They have all the power they can possibly have over any subject the moment it reaches the hand of the consignee under the present law, and I believe there are plenty of ways by which the States to-day can make effective their laws without undertaking to go out of the province of State sovereignty into that of national sovereignty and to give their laws extraterritorial effect. When whisky comes into the State of Iowa the State of Iowa gets absolute jurisdiction and the National Government loses absolute control over it; then the State can do as it pleases, and can make its prohibition effective if it wants to.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Those practical difficulties do not exist?

"Mr. SHERLEY. I do not say they do not exist, but I do not consider that the practical difficulties in a case have the right to make this body undertake to disregard that great line of cleavage between what control belongs to the Nation and what to the State. You are making a precedent that is most dangerous.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It was held in the Leisly case that the original package was an essential feature of interstate commerce?

"Mr. SHERLEY. That was based on the principle of the right to sell in the original package.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That involves the original-package proposition?

"Mr. SHERLEY. No; the original-package proposition was involved in the Bowman case, which held that you had the right to import in the original package.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The Leisly-Hardin decision held that the right to sell was an essential feature of interstate commerce?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And for that reason no State law could prohibit the sale?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir; but I contend that they have the power now to prevent the sale.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If you can eliminate one element of interstate commerce by transportation, what is the matter with the other elements?

"Mr. SHERLEY. The element you are eliminating in regard to the sale is not a real element, but only an incident of interstate commerce. There can be interstate commerce without the power in the consignee to sell, but there can not be interstate commerce without the power to import. One goes to an incident of interstate commerce and the other goes to the commerce itself, and my position is that Congress can not legislate so as to give to the States the power to regulate interstate commerce, however much they may be able to lift the restrictions now on the States so as to make a subject of interstate commerce lose its interstate character at an earlier period than it would otherwise. That point is clearly shown in the wording of the decision in the Rahrer case. The Rahrer case in effect says: 'We do not create any rights in the State; we simply lift the ban of the National Government which it has by virtue of its regulation of interstate commerce and permit the State laws to operate.'

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. As to an element of interstate commerce?

"Mr. SHERLEY. As to an incident.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did the decision call it an incident rather than an element of interstate commerce?

"Mr. SHERLEY. The Rhodes case, in reviewing the Rahrer case, did. The court used this exact language:

"While it is true that the right to sell free from State interference interstate-commerce merchandise was held in Leisly v. Hardin to be an essential incident to interstate commerce, it was yet but an incident, as the contract of sale within a State in its nature was usually subject to the control of the legislative authority of the State.

"On the other hand, the right to contract for the transportation of merchandise from one State into or across another involved interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect, and imported in its very essence a relation which necessarily must be governed by laws apart from the laws of the several States, since it embraced a contract which must come under the laws of more than one State. The purpose of Congress to submit the incidental power to sell to the dominion of State authority should not, without the clearest implication, be held to imply the purpose of subjecting to State laws a contract which in its very object and nature was not susceptible of such regulation even if the constitutional right to do so existed, as to which no opinion is expressed. (170 U. S., p. 424.)

"The question here asked by the court and left undecided must, in my humble judgment, be answered in the negative.

"While Congress can lift its arm from the State so as to give to it the free exercise of the power it would naturally have within its State lines, it can not give to the State the power to go out beyond the State limits and regulate interstate commerce, and I believe that to be the true distinction, the distinction that is so strongly intimated in the Rhodes decision.

"Of course this is a very close question, and I am free to confess that it is one concerning which there can be readily differences of opinion. The point that I make is this: That the Wilson law says, as construed by the Supreme Court, that the interstate character of alcoholic liquors shall be lost before instead of after the sale.

"It did not go to the vital aspect of interstate commerce. That aspect of it which is vital and fundamental is the right of importation from one State to another, and it does not seem to me that the right of importation necessarily carries with it the right to sell, although it was so declared back in the Leisly case in regard to interstate commerce and in regard to foreign commerce in the case of Brown v. Maryland. What you are asked to do here is to absolutely prevent interstate commerce not by a national law but by permission to the State to prevent it. The State has no power over the fundamental aspects of interstate commerce.

"It has power over those things which are incident to it, which are local to it. You can not make any regulations in regard to pilotage; you can not make any regulations in regard to any sort of tax or fee, or anything else, without in some way affecting interstate commerce; that is, if it applies to anything outside the State at all. There is a vast distinction, however, between affecting interstate commerce in that sense and affecting it in the sense of absolutely preventing its existence. Congress itself can prevent its existence, and Congress should do it if it wants to be honest and believes it ought to be done.

"Mr. SMITH. Does not the sale of an article imported into a State bear about the same relation to interstate commerce that the manufacture of the article does?

"Mr. SHERLEY. In this connection it certainly does.

"Mr. CLAYTON. That was decided in the Sugar case?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is the right to import without the right to sell?

"Mr. SHERLEY. It is a very considerable right, for you may have the right to sell in the State where the goods are made. I live, for instance, in the State of Iowa, and I go into the State of Kentucky, where, as I have heard it said, the whisky is so good that intemperance becomes a virtue, and I conclude that I want to get some of that whisky and carry it back to Iowa. I make a contract in the city of Louisville by which the manufacturer is to ship to me, in the State of Iowa, some whisky. That is a very valuable right to me, even if it does not carry with it the right to sell the whisky in Iowa.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But, as a business proposition, is the right of import of any substantial value without the right to sell?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably, without the right to sell in the place where imported, because the right to import may be exercised after the sale has already been made in another State. In other words, you make your contract of sale in the State of Kentucky and you carry out your importation by sending it over to the State of Iowa.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You carry it through the State of Iowa?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Into the State. The mistake you make is in supposing that the only sale that can be made is one made after delivery. Now, the import sale, the sale that really gives commercial value to the commodity, is the sale that is made before delivery. A person may contract in another State for the purchase of any particular commodity, and it becomes interstate commerce afterwards. Of course there would be no value in the right to import if you could not buy and sell at either end of the line.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The sale takes place at that point quite largely, although purchased for shipment into another State?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir; the sale becomes completed, for instance, in Kentucky, and if this proposed law is passed and is constitutional the effect of it will be to say that while you can buy if you want to in another State, one of the incidents of the contract—that it shall be shipped to you into the State of Iowa—shall not be carried out, and then you have the beautiful spectacle of one State absolutely annulling the law of another State, and that is what I mean by saying that this law gives an extra territorial effect to the laws of the States.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does not the law substantially do that now? I understand your illustration, which is entirely sound; although liquor is sold in Kentucky to be delivered in Iowa, the sale takes place in Kentucky. Now, does not the law that deprives the consignee in Iowa of the right to sell in original packages impair the commercial value?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir; but does not destroy it.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do you contend, as a commercial proposition, that the main purpose of the transportation from Kentucky into Iowa is not that it may be sold, and that when the law prevents it from being sold the main purpose of the consignee is not defeated?

"Mr. SHERLEY. If your premises were true, these people would not be here advocating this present law. They think there is a distinction. They think it interferes very materially with interstate commerce, and if tlfey did not think so they would not be here advocating a proposition that goes further than any proposition ever submitted to the national legislative body.

"Mr. PARKER. Have you considered the effect of the Wilson law on such a case as this? Suppose the Iowa law was in New York City, where there are large jobbing houses and where a jobbing house purchases a large quantity of liquor and then ships it to another State; what about that second sale to be exported somewhere else?

"Mr. SHERLEY. I am inclined to think, without having looked at that specific point, that it would be treated as a separate transaction, so that the jobber sending on his goods into other States would be considered as beginning a new interstate transaction which would be entitled to the same privileges as if there had been one transaction, provided, of course, the laws of New York permitted the jobber to hold the liquor received from another State and did not immediately confiscate it after receipt by the jobber.

"Mr. PARKER. Does your argument go so far as to say that the State law can not prevent a purchase in one State to be carried into another and then shipped into a third State?

"Mr. SHERLEY. I am inclined to believe that, for instance, alcoholic liquors—to make the case specific—bought in Kentucky and brought into Iowa and delivered to an Iowa consignee, could by the law of Iowa be prevented from being exported out of Iowa into another State.

"Mr. PARKER. You think it would?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir; for this reason, that the very moment the interstate journey is ended, that moment the property passes from under the protection of the national law obtained by that provision giving Congress power to regulate commerce and becomes a part of the general property within the State. But this question might come up, as to whether one State could prevent the exportation of articles of commerce to another State, but that would be under an entirely different provision of the Constitution.

"But laying aside that question, which has no bearing here, I am inclined to think that the moment whisky came in there and became absolutely a part of the rest of the wealth of the State, that then the laws of the State could seize it and absolutely prevent its use or sale or consumption in any way.

"Mr. PALMER. What are your clients' fears based on, that Congress will violate the Constitution?

"Mr. SHERLEY. I have no clients. I am a Member of Congress doing my duty, as I think, to uphold the Constitution of the United States.

"Mr. PALMER. Your constituents, then, because you stated that you represented one of the largest distilling districts in Kentucky.

"Mr. SHERLEY. My constituents object to this law naturally, that is, my whisky and beer constituents, because it does interfere with their trade. The National Government recognizes that trade and raises a tremendous revenue out of it, and it ought to have the courage and honesty to stand in the open and either legislate so as to prevent alcoholic liquors being made at all, by putting the tax so high as to be prohibitory, or it ought to have the courage to protect the men engaged in that pursuit, in ordinary common fairness.

"That is my position aside from the question of the legal right. But this committee must determine and has no right to shirk the responsibility as to whether a law is constitutional and what is going to be the effect if you pass it. If you establish this precedent Congress can have the same power as to any article of interstate commerce. Take, for instance, tobacco, why should not Congress pass a law prohibiting practically the importation of tobacco from one State to another? You know the cry that goes out in regard to cigarettes, and in regard to smoking generally. There are people who believe just as strongly in regard to the destruction of the Nation from cigarette smoking as from alcoholic liquor drinking. Why should not Congress pass a law to give the States absolute power to prevent interstate commerce in regard to tobacco, and then, when you have gotten through with tobacco, why should you not take up a number of other things?

"There are a great many people in this country who believe that the trusts are going to absolutely destroy America. We all know that the State of New Jersey has a little habit of incorporating trusts and giving them the power to do whatever they want in any State but New Jersey. We have suffered from it. Why should not this great body pass a law which will say to the States that they may prohibit trust-made goods coming into the State, the same as they may now prohibit trust-made goods being manufactured in the States?

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Why do you not do that in Kentucky now and drive such corporations out of Kentucky?

"Mr. SHERLEY. Kentucky can prohibit them doing business but it can not prohibit their goods coming in. If you are going to legislate this power, give us the power to prevent trust goods coming in, and the State of Kentucky will be able to take care of the matter.

"Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What good would there be in sending commodities into Kentucky if they could not be disposed of? They might export them out.

"Mr. SHERLEY. There would be this particular good, that they would have the right to make the sale in advance and send direct to the consumer, and until you pass a law as to commodities other than alcoholic liquors, going so far as the Wilson law already has gone, they would have the power to sell them within the State.

"Now, in regard to alcoholic liquors, it seems to me that the logic of this case is simply to say this, we will let the States go back into that condition of commerce that existed prior to the formation of the National Government, and let them under the police powers, by their desire to do what they think necessary or convenient, so legislate so to prevent free intercourse between the States. But the precedent that would be established would doubtless lead to legislation affecting other articles of interstate commerce. It would simply become a question of the strength of any particular State in the National Congress to obtain legislation affecting any other commodity that it might desire.

"And while the Vance case, which was decided at the same time as the Rhodes case, holds that no State might directly discriminate against the products of another State it would be practicable to indirectly discriminate; for instance, a State not manufacturing a lard product made out of cottonseed oil might decide to prevent such product of a sister State being brought into competition with the lard manufactured within its own borders from animal fat. If it was powerful enough to obtain from Congress a law permitting it to treat lard made from cottonseed oil shipped into the State the same as if created there, it could then by a sufficient tax practically prevent the shipment, or could entirely prohibit it on the ground that such product was injurious to health, and could thereby create a monopoly for the lard made from animal fat.

"This is but a crude illustration, but it does illustrate what is possible to be done by the States should Congress decide to follow the dangerous precedent set forth in this case, having in mind that in the course of time every precedent, even though established for a good purpose, is taken advantage of for some less worthy object."

STATEMENT OF HON. LAWRENCE MAXWELL, JR.

"Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Maxwell, I think you said you wanted to be heard.

"Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not think the bill before the committee involves consideration of the question of the general power of Congress to prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquor in interstate commerce, because any such provision would necessarily involve a complete revolution in the great body of the laws of the United States and in its fiscal system. I understand that the total revenue of the Federal Government for the fiscal year 1910, raised by taxation, amounted to $675,000,000, and that of that revenue $252,000,000 was derived from the tax on intoxicating liquor. So that if the transportation of these liquors in interstate commerce is to be considered by Congress, it must be in connection with an entire change of policy as to the fiscal affairs of the Government and its taxation.

"Mr. NORRIS. Could I ask you a question there? Can you give us any information as to how much of that tax is derived from the intoxicating liquors used illegally or sold illegally?

"Mr. MAXWELL. How can you ascertain that?

"Mr. NORRIS. Well, I do not know; I was trying to get information from you.

"Mr. MAXWELL. That could not be ascertained. You might ascertain what liquor was transported into the States that have regulating laws, but how much of that, if any, was used illegally or transported for the purpose of being used illegally, of course, could not be ascertained. I am told that in the Internal Revenue Department the greatest violation of the internal-revenue laws with respect to the manufacture of distilled spirits occurs in the States where prohibitory laws are in force, and those statistics the committee can easily get from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I understand that the work of the Department of Justice in punishing violations of the internal-revenue laws is largely in States where the traffic in intoxicating liquor is wholly prohibited.

"Mr. NORRIS. This law would not apply to this, as I understand it. That would not be interstate commerce.

"Mr. MAXWELL. That would not be interstate commerce; no.

"On the question of the general and absolute prohibition of transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce you would have to consider whether Congress, under the power given to it by the Constitution to regulate, could prohibit the transportation of an article which by the commercial usages of the world and the laws of the United States is an article of commerce. You would also with respect to the particular method of prohibition suggested by this bill have to consider some fundamental principles established by the Constitution of the United States. For instance, in the case of Adair v. United States (208 U. S., 162) the court held that Congress had no power to make it a criminal offense against the United States for a carrier engaged in interstate commerce to discharge an employee simply because of membership in a labor organization, and that a provision to that effect in an act of Congress concerning interstate commerce was a violation of personal liberty as well as of the right of property created by the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That was an act passed under the authority of Congress to regulate inerstate commerce, and the Supreme Court struck down that provision because the power of Congress was limited in respect to regulation of interstate commerce by other fundamental provisions in the Constitution of the United States.

"Take another case, the case United States v. Fox (95 U. S., 670). The court decided that section 5132 of the Revised Statutes, which declares that every person respecting whom proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced, who, within three months before their commencement obtains goods upon false pretenses with intent to defraud, shall be punished by imprisonment, was inoperative to render the act an offense, because its criminal character was to be determined by a subsequent proceeding. The act was criminal if within three months there should be proceedings in bankruptcy. It was not criminal if the proceedings were commenced in three months and a day. The Supreme Court held it was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Why? Justice Field, in the course of his opinion, did not refer to any specific provision of the Constitution, but decided that an act which is not an offense at the time it is committed can not become such by any subsequent independent act of the party with which it has no connection. The criminal intent must exist when the act complained of is done; it can not be imputed from a subsequent independent transaction. And there are other decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and in State courts suggesting the same principle.

"Mr. MOON. Take a simple illustration. Suppose we passed a law requiring railroads to carry everybody at a rate of 1 cent a mile. That is regulation of interstate commerce.

"Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

"Mr. MOON. Where anything of that kind has been attempted it has been at once said that it is confiscatory. Therefore the powers of Congress are subject to all the other limitations placed in the Constitution of the United States.

"Mr. MAXWELL. They must be; that has been decided frequently by the Supreme Court.

"Now, with respect to this particular bill. It says that the transaction is prohibited and the contract is declared to be void if one of the parties, unknown to the other, intends to violate any law of a State. That is an attempt to declare a transaction invalid because one of the parties to the transaction, unknown to the other, intends to violate in the future, when he gets the goods, some law of the State. Suppose he does have that intent in his mind when the goods are ordered. Suppose he abandons that intention before the goods are delivered to the carrier or after they are delivered to the carrier and before they are delivered to him. Nevertheless, that intent which he had at the time he purchased the goods, and at any time before the goods are delivered to him, renders the whole transaction invalid.

"Mr. WEBB. Mr. Maxwell, if you agree that Congress could prohibit entirely that shipment without assigning cause, don't you admit that it could limit it?

"Mr. MAXWELL. Certainly Congress could not do that. But by this bill Congress is asked to say that a transaction is invalid if one of the parties to that transaction has the intent at any time, undisclosed to the other, to violate some law of the State.

"Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Maxwell, if this bill were changed so that the intent were confined to one person, would it, in your judgment, change the status of the thing?

"Mr. MAXWELL. No; it would not. The right of transportation in interstate commerce is a right of the consignor, of the vendor, as well as the consignee, and that right can not be affected so as to render the contract invalid as against the seller because of the undisclosed purpose or intent of the buyer to violate the law.

"Mr. NORRIS. The point I wanted to make is this: In your argument you have repeatedly said that this law would apply if the intent of any of the persons was to use it illegally, that intent being unknown to any of the other persons. Then your judgment would be that the law would be just as bad if the intent were confined entirely to one person in the transportation.

"Mr. MAXWELL. Yes; and for what reason? You can not have an interstate transaction without the cooperation of two or more, and it is not within the power of Congress or any legislature under a constitutional government to declare a contract, which requires the cooperation of two or more persons, invalid because one of those persons has the intent to commit a crime.

"Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. Do you concede that Congress has the constitutional power to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors altogether?

"Mr. MAXWELL. I do not; I do not concede that power.

"Mr. MOON. Do you concede the second proposition, that even supposing they had, it gives them the right to discriminate?

"Mr. MAXWELL. Not at all.

"Mr. MOON. They have a right to say that diseased cattle shall not go into interstate commerce, and thereby absolutely outlaw them, but they have not a right—if they do not outlaw—to discriminate between the different States as to the shipment.

"Mr. MAXWELL. They have not; no, sir. That means, to use the language of Mr. Justice Matthews in the case of Bowman v. Railway Co., commercial anarchy. The very purpose of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution was to prevent commercial anarchy and to have interstate commerce subject, and subject only, to uniform rules established by the Congress of the United States, so that when any man in a foreign country or in this country wishes to engage in interstate commerce the only law that he has to consult is the law of the United States. On the other hand, under this bill no man in London, Paris, or New York, or Philadelphia could engage in interstate commerce in this commodity without consulting the law of the State to which the goods are to go. He can not find out whether an interstate transaction is regulated, or to what extent, by making an exhaustive search of the laws of the United States. He would not get a start there, because immediately he would be referred to the various laws of the States. That is just what the commerce clause was intended to prevent. Under the commerce clause a man who wants to engage in interstate commerce or foreign commerce is required to consult, and to consult only, the laws of the United States.

"Mr. CARLIN. A great deal of stress has been laid on the fact that Congress has recognized in the way of statutes the shipment of birds. What have you to say about that?

"Mr. MAXWELL. I am very glad to have an opportunity to say a word about that. What I have said just now about the prohibition of interstate traffic or the power of Congress to absolutely prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce is, in my opinion, quite aside from the question that you have before you in this bill. The fundamental objection to this bill, the objection which is vital and can not be overcome, is the objection that this bill undertakes to delegate to the States whatever regulation of interstate commerce is to be accomplished by the bill, and, as the chairman of the subcommitee so clearly pointed out, this law itself discloses no regulation; it has no vitality except as State laws come in. The power to regulate is the power to prescribe the rules under which interstate commerce shall be conducted, and there are no rules in this bill. The rules exist only when the State acts and to the extent that the State acts, and when the State repeals the law there is no rule, and when the State amends the law the rule is modified.

"Now, it is said, 'Does that delegate the power to the State?' There is no magic in the word 'delegate.' The objection is that Congress undertakes to regulate commerce among the States, not by any rule which it prescribes, but by a rule which it leaves the States to prescribe.

"Has Congress any policy—because the regulation of interstate commerce must evidence some public policy—has Congress any policy about the transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce? None whatever by this bill. Whatever is the policy of any particular State is the policy adopted by this bill. Congress has no policy. Congress by this law leaves the regulation, whatever it is, the expression of public policy, entirely to the State and dependent upon the State.

"In that connection, if the committee will allow me, I would like to quote a passage from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden. On page 206 he says:

"The act of 1803 (3 U. S. L., 529) prohibiting the importation of slaves into any State which shall itself prohibit their importation implies, it is said, an admission that the States possessed the power to exclude or admit them, from which it is inferred that they possess the same power with respect to other articles.

"If this inference were correct; if this power was exercised not under any particular clause in the Constitution but in virtue of a general right over the subject of commerce, to exist as long as the Constitution itself, it might now be exercised. Any State might now import African slaves into its own territory. But it is obvious that the power of the States over this subject previous to the year 1808 constitutes an exception to the power of Congress to regulate commerce, and the exception is expressed in such words as to manifest clearly the intention to continue the preexisting right of the States to admit or exclude for a limited period. The words are: "The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808." The whole object of the exception is to preserve the power to those States which might be disposed to exercise it; and its language seems to the court to convey this idea unequivocally. The possession of this particular power, then, during the time limited in the Constitution can not be admitted to prove the possession of any other similar power.

"Now, Mr. Caldwell could not, of course, fail to appreciate the vital importance of the objection which we urge to this bill; and, so far as possible, I have refrained from discussing any other objection. What is the good of considering other objections to a bill which is clearly repugnant to the Constitution of the United States because it delegates to the States a power which rests exclusively in Congress? And Mr. Caldwell, fine lawyer as he is, thoroughly appreciative of the significance of that objection, argued here for two hours without ever touching the point, and then, when his attention was called late in the afternoon to that objection, he referred to the Lottery case. But the act of Congress involved in that case did not leave anything to the States. It prohibited absolutely the interstate transportation of lottery tickets. It delegated no power to the States and was not dependent on any State law.

"Another illustration used by Mr. Caldwell was that of obscene books, being section 245 of the Criminal Code of the United States. Congress does not say they are prohibited between States which provide that obscene books and pictures shall not be received. Congress declares its own rule, and says that obscene books shall not be transported in the mails or carried in interstate commerce. There is no delegation of power to the States.

"Then, with respect to the adoption or enactment of criminal laws of the States, in territory within the States subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, being section 289 of the Criminal Code, Congress left nothing to the States. Congress said that the laws in existence were enacted by it and that they should remain in force, so far as the United States are concerned, notwithstanding any subsequent repeal or amendment thereof by the State. There was no delegation of power to the State.

"Then they cite the Lacey Act of 1900, now section 242 of the Criminal Code, which makes it unlawful to transport in interstate commerce the dead bodies of wild animals or birds killed in violation of the law of the State in which they were killed or from which they were shipped, and Mr. Caldwell says that statute is an instance of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, dependent upon action by the State. What Congress did by that statute was to make it illegal to transport in interstate commerce certain animals, or the dead bodies of certain animals, which are by the common law feræ naturæ, which belong to the sovereign, and which can not become private property or an article of commerce except with the sovereign's consent. Whether wild animals and birds are property depends entirely upon the law of the State in which they are killed. There is no other law that can govern the subject. What Congress did was to say that, since wild animals and birds killed in violation of law are not articles of commerce, they shall not be transported in interstate commerce. They are not property at all.

"The statute has been before the courts in two cases. In United States v. Smith (115 Fed., 423), which was an indictment under the statute before Archbald, in the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania in 1902, he sustained a demurrer to the indictment on the ground that it did not state an offense.

"Mr. WEBB. In that it failed to set up the State law.

"Mr. MAXWELL. The indictment was not sustained, because it was not a good indictment. Here is what he said in his opinion, at page 428, in answer to the argument that the statute was unconstitutional:

"According to the views so expressed, I am therefore clearly of the opinion that no evasion or violation of the act is disclosed in the indictment, and that the demurrer must be sustained. The larger question whether the act is a legitimate exercise of the power given to Congress by the Constitution to legislate with regard to interstate commerce, or is merely, as charged, a national game law, thinly disguised, which it had no authority to pass, although fully discussed at the argument, I do not feel called upon to decide. Neither do I the further question whether—assuming the act to be valid—dead game carried in the hands, or as part of the personal luggage of the party who has killed it, must be regarded as falling within the terms of the act when transported under such conditions from State to State.

"Mr. CARLIN. Did he hold that the dead game was property?

"Mr. MAXWELL. He did not. United States v. Thompson (147 Fed., 637) is the other case in which the statute has been before the courts. A demurrer to the indictment was sustained in that case. The question of the validity of the statute was not discussed or passed upon.

"Mr. WEBB. Mr. Maxwell, may I make this suggestion? Have you read the report of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee that reported this game-law bill?

"Mr. MAXWELL. I have not.

"Mr. WEBB. It was written by Mr. Sherman, who is now Vice President, and I wish to say that the reason for passing the law suggested by you was never even hinted at by the gentleman who made the report. I have never heard it asserted in this country that if a man takes wild game in his own possession it is not property. I am quite sure you will find Congress did not undertake to exercise its power based on that supposition.

"Mr. MAXWELL. That is not a supposition; that is as old and as certain as any principle of law can be that the power to appropriate animals which are feræ naturæ as private property depends wholly upon the consent of the sovereign. They are the property of the sovereign, and no man can acquire a right of private property in them except with the consent of the sovereign. Who is the sovereign? The sovereign is the State in which the animals are. Therefore, when the State has prohibited the killing or reduction to possession of those animals by killing, it says there can be no private property in them. That is as old as English law, and all that Congress has done, therefore, is to say that an article which is not the subject of private property, and which is therefore not essentially an article of commerce, shall not be transported.[1]

"[1] The point is settled by the case of Greer v. State of Connecticut (161 U. S., 519). A statute of Connecticut, while providing an open season for the killing of birds, made it an offense to have the birds in possession with intention to procure their transportation beyond the limits of the State. The offense with which Greer was charged was the possession of game birds for the purpose of transporting them beyond the State, although they had been lawfully killed within the State. The Supreme Court of Connecticut sustained the conviction, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States upon the claim that the Connecticut statute was repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. In stating the case, Mr. Justice White said that the sole question was whether the State of Connecticut had "the power to regulate the killing of game within her borders so as to confine its use to the limits of the State and forbid its transmission outside of the State" (161 U. S., 522).

"He said (p. 522):

"'The solution of the question involves a consideration of the nature of the property in game and the authority which the State had a right lawfully to exercise in relation thereto. From the earliest traditions the right to reduce animals feræ naturæ to possession has been subject to the control of the law-giving powers.'

"The learned justice then examines the law of Greece, Rome, France, Germany, and England. At page 527 he says:

"'The practice of the Government of England from the earliest time to the present has put into execution the authority to control and regulate the taking of game.'

"This authority, he says, passed to the Colonies, and then to the States. Citing many American cases, he says, at page 528:

"'The adjudicated cases recognizing the right of the State to control and regulate the common property in game are numerous.'

"At page 529 he says:

"'The common ownership and its resulting responsibility in the State are thus stated in a well-considered opinion of the Supreme Court of California: "The wild game within a State belongs to the people in their collective sovereign capacity. It is not the subject of private ownership, except in so far as the people may elect to make it so, and they may, if they see fit, absolutely prohibit the taking of it or any traffic and commerce in it if deemed necessary for its protection or preservation or the public good."'

"At page 530 he says:

"'In view of the authority of the State to affix conditions to the killing and sale of game, predicated as is this power on the peculiar nature of such property and its common ownership by all the citizens of the State, it may well be doubted whether commerce is created by an authority given by a State to reduce game within its borders to possession, provided such game be not taken, when killed, without the jurisdiction of the State. The common ownership imports the right to keep the property, if the sovereign so chooses, always within its jurisdiction for every purpose. The qualification which forbids its removal from the State necessarily entered into and formed part of every transaction on the subject and deprived the mere sale or exchange of these articles of that element of freedom of contract and of full ownership which is an essential attribute of commerce.'

"At page 532 he says:

"'The power of the State to control the killing of and ownership in game being admitted, the commerce in game, which the State law permitted, was necessarily only internal commerce, since the restriction that it should not become the subject of external commerce went along with the grant and was a part of it. All ownership in game killed within the State came under this condition, which the State had the lawful authority to impose, and no contracts made in relation to such property were exempt from the law of the State consenting that such contracts be made, provided only they were confined to internal and did not extend to external commerce.'

"The point of the decision is emphasized in the dissenting opinions of Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Harlan, who were of opinion that the game was property and, therefore, an article of commerce because it had been lawfully killed. The decision of the court proceeded upon the ground that the game was not property and, therefore, not an article of commerce and the statute of the State forbidding its transportation beyond the State was, consequently, not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

"On the same ground the court, in New York ex rel. Silz v. Hesterberg (211 U. S., 31), held that a statute of New York making it an offense to have possession of game within the State during the closed season, although it had been lawfully taken in foreign countries during the open season there, was not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Geer v. Connecticut, supra, was followed and applied. In concluding his opinion, Mr. Justice Day said, at page 43:

"'The New York Court of Appeals further held that the so-called Lacey Act (31 Stat., 187, chap. 553, U. S. Comp. Stat., 1901, p. 290) relieved the regulation of the objection in question because of the consent of Congress to the passage of such laws concerning such commerce, interstate and foreign, within the principles upon which the Wilson Act was sustained by this court. Re Rahrer (Wilkinson v. Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545.)

"'In the aspect in which the game law of New York is now before this court we think it was a valid exertion of the police power, independent of any authorization thereof by the Lacey Act, and we shall therefore not stop to examine the provisions of that act.'

"In Rupert v. United States (181 Fed., 87), in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, decided March 5, 1910, a conviction under the Lacey Act was sustained, the court saying at page 90:

"'Quail belong to the State or Territory, or rather to the people collectively thereof, and are subject to the local laws as to killing and the times therefor and the shipment. These propositions have been put at rest by the Supreme Court. (Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S., 519; Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S., 133.) It is for the State legislature to say when quail may be killed. It may provide that they shall not be killed at any time. It may provide that they may be killed for use at home only and not killed for shipment out of the State, which, if allowed, would result in the extinguishment locally of such game. And no one doubts the validity of game laws which prohibits killing of game on the lands of another. It is quite likely that every State of the Union has such laws, and such was the common law. The individual having no ownership in the game and allowed at certain times, if at all, to kill the same at certain places for particular uses only, it does not become the general subject of commerce free from all inhibitions.'"

"Mr. NORRIS. In that case you would have to look to something besides the Federal statute to see——

"Mr. MAXWELL. To see what? To see whether the article offered for transportation is in fact an article of commerce, and that can be determined only by the law of the State, which has the sole right to say whether its wild animals and birds may be appropriated as private property.

"Mr. NORRIS. You would have to look to the State statute in order to see whether your Federal law applied.

"Mr. MAXWELL. You would have to look to the State statute to see whether it was an article of commerce at all; in other words, whether it was property.

"Mr. WEBB. And whether the Federal statute had been violated.

"Mr. MAXWELL. No; not whether it had been violated, but whether the thing offered for transportation is in fact an object of commerce by the law of the State, which is the only law that can make it an article of commerce. But when you deal with spirits, wine, ale, and beer, which are recognized by the commercial usages of the world as articles of commerce, you do not have to go to any State law to see whether they are in fact articles of commerce.

"Mr. WEBB. But in the open season the Federal Congress makes these birds an article of commerce and permits their transportation, because the various States which have these State laws permit the killing of them and their transportation.

"Mr. MAXWELL. Congress does not make them articles of commerce at all.

"Mr. CARLIN. The birds do not seem to have had friends enough to raise the question. That has never been passed upon?

"Mr. MAXWELL. The constitutionality of the statute has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court. But why should we get involved in a discussion as to the constitutionality of the Lacey law. The question before the committee is whether the Webb bill is constitutional. The two are not the same or similar. One relates to wild animals and birds over which the States have exclusive control; the other to spirits, wine, ale, and beer, which "are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce," to use the words of the Supreme Court in its latest decision announced only a month or so ago in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. F. W. Cook Brewing Co.

"Mr. WEBB. Let me suggest this: You are aware, of course, that the Supreme Court of the United States has said that no citizen of the United States or any State has any inherent right to manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors. In that particular case liquor stands almost alone. You could not say that as to raising wheat and corn. The United States Government has put whisky on a different basis, and we contend that no man has a right to make it or sell it, but there is no power in Congress to limit its transportation.

"Mr. MAXWELL. The State, in the exercise of its police power, may say that intoxicating liquors shall not be manufactured, that they shall not be possessed, perhaps that they shall not be used by the individual for his personal use, and that they shall not be subject to bargain and sale. Now, that is essentially a State matter, a local matter, upon which the power of the State is ample and complete. There is no law of the United States that interferes in the slightest degree with the full exertion of the police power of the State in respect to the use of or traffic in intoxicating liquors within the State. Now, what is the purpose of this bill? Is it to enlarge the police powers of the State? Of course, if it is, it is invalid. Is it to assist the State in the enforcement of its police power?

"Mr. WEBB. Right there I want to ask you this question: There is a period of time between the arrival of a consignment of whisky in the express office and its delivery during which the State can not take any action with reference to it. In other words, a package of whisky that arrives in a town, say, to-day, may remain in that express office or depot two days, three days, or a week, and the State has not power to touch it until it is delivered to the consignee.

"Mr. MAXWELL. Until it is delivered to the consignee, or until the carrier holds it as warehouseman for the consignee.

"Mr. WEBB. He has got to hold it a reasonable time. Now, can you suggest—I realize you are a great lawyer—can you suggest any way by which the State might have some right with reference to that whisky if it is shown it is intended to be used in violation of its laws where it rests within her territory and within her jurisdiction?

"Mr. MAXWELL. Not prior to the delivery to the consignee, so long as the Constitution of the United States and the commerce clause of the Constitution stand and are enforced.

"Mr. WEBB. Congress can not enforce it?

"Mr. MAXWELL. Congress can not——

"Mr. WEBB. Then there is no sovereign power anywhere to control liquor?

"Mr. MAXWELL. What you were asking was with respect to the power of the State. I do not mean to say that the Federal Congress has no power.

"Mr. WEBB. You say the Federal Congress can not prohibit the interstate shipment of whisky——

"Mr. MAXWELL. My opinion is—but that question is not involved here, and I would prefer to be excused from discussing it, because I have come to discuss a particular bill and an objection that is fundamental under the Constitution. But I do say that no State, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, can exercise any police power over an interstate shipment prior to its delivery to the consignee. The delivery to the consignee may be by delivering it to the person or to his agent, or it may be by retaining it for him in a warehouse. The fundamental objection is that consistently with the Constitution of the United States no such police power can be exerted by the State, even with the consent of Congress. That is reenforced in such clear and explicit terms by Mr. Justice Lurton in the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. against F. W. Cook Brewing Co., in an opinion rendered January 22, 1912, that I would like the permission of the chairman or Mr. WEBB to read what he says on that subject. A member of the committee has suggested that this decision does not add anything to prior decisions. That may be true, but it states clearly the principles which had been established by the decisions:

"By a long line of decisions, beginning even prior to Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), it has been indisputably determined:

"(a) That beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce.

"(b) That it is not competent for any State to forbid any common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.

"(c) That until such transportation is concluded by delivery to the consignee, such commodities do not become subject to State regulation restraining their sale or disposition.

"The Wilson Act, which subjects such liquors to State regulation, although still in the original packages, does not apply before actual delivery to such consignee where the shipment is interstate. Some of the many later cases in which these matters have been so determined and the Wilson Act construed are: Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412); Vance v. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438); Heyman v. Southern Railway (203 U. S., 270); Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky (214 U. S., 218).

"Valid as the Kentucky legislation undoubtedly was as a regulation in respect to intrastate shipments of such articles, it was most obviously never an effective enactment in so far as it undertook to regulate interstate shipments to dry points. Pending this very litigation, the Kentucky Court of Appeals, upon the authority of the line of cases above cited, reached the same conclusion. (C. & N. O. Ry. v. Kentucky, 126 Ky., 563.)

"The obligation of the railroad company to conform to the requirements of the Kentucky law, so far as that law prohibited intrastate shipments, is clear, and to this extent its circular notification was commendable. But the duty of this company, as an interstate common carrier for hire, is to receive for transportation to consignees upon its line in Kentucky from consignors in other States any commodity which is an ordinary subject of interstate commerce, and such transportation could not be prohibited by any law of the State of such consignee, inasmuch as any such law would be an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce not authorized by the police power of the State.

"Mr. WEBB. I think we all agree that that is the law.

"Mr. MAXWELL. What is sought to be accomplished by this bill? Are you trying to enlarge the police power of the States? That you can not do. Are you trying to have that police power exerted before the interstate transaction in its fundamental aspect is completed? That you can not do. You are trying to do nothing that is within the power of Congress. Absolutely nothing.

"Now, if the committee please, the suggestion is made that if this bill is of doubtful constitutionality put it up to the Supreme Court.

"Mr. WEBB. I want to say that I have made no such suggestion.

"Mr. MAXWELL. I know you have not, and I do not believe you would concur in that. I am a lawyer and nothing else. I want the courts preserved for the administration of justice. It is essential under our system of government that the Supreme Court of the United States should be vested with authority to pass upon the constitutionality of statutes, but it is desirable that that jurisdiction should be invoked as little as possible. The common cry when the court declares an act unconstitutional is that it is usurping the functions of the legislature. The pity is that that cry is used to impair the influence and usefulness of the courts for the primary purpose for which they are formed, to wit, the administration of justice between man and man. Therefore I deplore the presentation of constitutional cases to the court unnecessarily, and I am sure this committee, recognizing the duty resting upon it to maintain and preserve the Constitution, would hesitate to recommend a bill of doubtful validity with the idea of putting it up to the Supreme Court. That is something Congress should carefully refrain from doing, and therefore it is, if the committee please, that I have come here to offer the objections which seem to me to be fatal to this bill. What I have said is just what I would say if the bill were for argument before the Supreme Court of the United States in a case involving its constitutionality.

"Senator Knox, in stating his views relative to the constitutionality of bills to regulate interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors, which were before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and reported upon adversely by it in 1909, said (S. Doc. No. 146, p. 9, 61st Cong., 1st sess.):

"My conclusions are:
"First. Interstate shipments are not completed until they reach the consignee.
"Second. An interruption or interference with interstate shipments before they reach the consignee constitutes a regulation of commerce.
"Third. Regulating interstate shipments is an exclusive function of Congress.
"Fourth. Congress can not delegate any part of its exclusive power to the States.
"Fifth. To remove the bar or impediment of exclusive Federal power which shuts the States out of the Federal domain and thereby allows them to enter that domain is to permit or sanction a State law in violation of the Constitution and in effect to delegate a Federal function to the States.
"For these and other reasons assigned I am constrained to vote against the bills we have been considering.

ARGUMENT OF EDGAR H. GANS, ESQ.

"Mr. GANS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me that the difficulty, if there is any, about this subject, arises out of misconceptions of certain fundamental distinctions. It shall be my effort to make these distinctions clear.

"Senator Rayner put his hand on the real question when he asked my colleague, Mr. Maxwell, how this proposed bill differed, in its constitutional aspect, from the bills that had heretofore been declared unconstitutional by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

"Those bills were introduced in the Sixtieth Congress, and their fundamental purpose was to submit intoxicating liquors transported into any State or Territory for delivery therein or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, to the police powers of the State immediately upon arrival within the boundary of the State, before and after delivery, in the same manner as though such articles had been produced in the State.

"The question, therefore, was whether Congress could withdraw its power over a shipment at the State line or at some point before the goods were delivered to the consignee and leave it to be regulated or prohibited by the police power of the State.

"On this question Senator Knox, who was chairman of the subcommittee on the Judiciary, said:

"My conclusions are:
"First. Interstate shipments are not completed until they reach the consignee.
"Second. An interruption or interference with interstate shipments before they reach the consignee constitutes a regulation of commerce.
"Third. Regulating interstate shipments is an exclusive function of Congress.
"Fourth. Congress can not delegate any part of its exclusive power to the States.
"Fifth. To remove the bar or impediment of exclusive Federal power which shuts the States out of the Federal domain, and thereby allow them to enter that domain, is to permit or sanction a State law in violation of the Constitution and in effect to delegate a Federal function to the States. (Doc. No. 146, 61st Cong., 1st sess., pp. ix, x.)

"Senator Rayner and Senator Fulton, in separate opinions, expressed substantially the same views, and the views of these three Senators were adopted by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

"In other words, when you are considering the transportation of commodities from one State to another, interstate commerce per se, or in its fundamental aspect, begins with the consignor and ends with delivery to the consignee, and Congress has no power to permit a State to regulate or prohibit any part of such interstate commerce.

"In the Kenyon bill now presented it is not proposed to divide the act of interstate commmerce so as to leave a part, even though it be the larger part, within the control of Congress and a lesser part under the control of the police power of the State.

"That is not the question here. This bill affects the whole shipment. It prohibits the shipment of intoxicating liquors from one State to another when the liquors are intended by any person interested therein, directly or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such other State enacted in the exercise of its police powers.

"Now, the only cases thus far decided by the Federal courts justifying acts of Congress which prohibited shipments of merchandise from one State to another are those which deal with 'contrabrands of commerce' or 'outlaws of commerce,' or things which are not fully the subjects of commerce.

"In his argument before this committee, Mr. Caldwell, the draftsman of this proposed law, frankly admitted that his idea was to get around the decision of the Senate Judiciary Committee already referred to by making the shipment a nuisance. His argument is that intoxicating liquors shipped from one State into another, when the intention of anybody concerned is to violate the law of such other State, is a nuisance, and can be constitutionally prohibited by Congress under the line of cases just adverted to. Is this argument sound?

"This argument makes it necessary for us to examine the line of cases concerning 'outlaws of commerce,' or, as it is sometimes called, 'illicit commerce,' and also those cases dealing with things not 'subjects' of commerce, becaues not possessing in the eyes of the law all the characteristics of property, and to understand the fundamental principles upon which such cases rest. When we fully understand these principles, we can then see whether, under them, the present proposed law can be justified.

"These principles are as follows:

"1. Anything is an 'outlaw' of commerce or 'not a subject' of commerce when it is so in its own nature as applied to all the people of the United States as one nation.

"2. They can therefore, under the national power of regulation of commerce, be denied by Congress the facilities of interstate commerce.

"3. They can also, because they are 'outlaws' of commerce or 'not subjects' of commerce be prohibited from being shipped out of or into the States by the States themselves.

"The leading case is that of Champion v. Ames (188 U. S., 321), commonly known as the Lottery case.

"The question there was whether Congress could prevent the transportation from State to State of lottery tickets. It was decided by five judges, four dissenting, that Congress had the power. The real ground of the decision was that lotteries were injurious to all the people, and of this the court could take judicial notice—that being so injurious to all the people, they could, in the interest of all the people, be denied the facilities of interstate commerce as 'outlaws' of commerce. The court says, page 355 (italics ours):

"We have said that the carrying from State to State of lottery tickets constitutes interstate commerce and that the regulation of such commerce is within the power of Congress under the Constitution. Are we prepared to say that a provision which is in effect a prohibition of the carriage of such articles from State to State is not a fit or appropriate mode for the regulation of that particular kind of commerce? If lottery traffic, carried on through interstate commerce, is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its power may be exerted, can it be possible that it must tolerate the traffic and simply regulate the manner in which it may be carried on? Or may not Congress, for the protection of the people of all of the States, and under the power to regulate commerce, devise such means, within the scope of the Constitution, and not prohibited by it, as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the States? * * *

"(P. 357.) Besides, Congress by that act does not assume to interfere with traffic or commerce in lottery tickets carried on exclusively within the limits of any State, but has in view only commerce of that kind among the several States. It has not assumed to interfere with the completely internal affairs of any State and has only legislated in respect of a matter which concerns the people of the United States. As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the 'widespread pestilence' of lotteries and protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another."

"Again, page 358:

"If the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another be interstate commerce, and if Congress is of the opinion that an effective regulation for the suppression of lotteries, carried on through such commerce, is to make it a criminal offense to cause lottery tickets to be carried from one State to another, we know of no authority in the courts to hold that the means thus devised are not appropriate and necessary to protect the country at large against a species of interstate commerce which, though in general use and somewhat favored in both National and State legislation in the early history of the country, has grown into disrepute and has become offensive to the entire people of the Nation.

"The same principle is announced in the case of Hippolite Egg Co. v. United States (220 U. S., 51) in construing the pure food and drug act of 1906 (ch. 3915, 34 Stat., 768), whose object is to keep adulterated articles out of the channels of interstate commerce or, if they enter such commerce, to condemn them while in transit or in original or unbroken packages after reaching destination.

"The question was whether certain cases of preserved whole eggs, which had been shipped from Missouri to Illinois, could be seized as adulterated in violation of the act in the original package in the hands of the consignee, even though they had not been shipped for sale but to be used by the consignee in manufacturing purposes. It was contended that the court had no jurisdiction in rem, because at the time of the seizure the eggs had passed into the general mass of property in the State and out of the field covered by interstate commerce.

"The court said (italics ours), page 57:

"We are dealing, it must be remembered, with illicit articles, articles which the law seeks to keep out of commerce, because they are de-based by adulteration, and which law punishes them (if we may so express ourselves) and the shipper of them. There is no denial that such is the purpose of the law, and the only limitation of the power to execute such purpose which is urged is that the articles must be apprehended in transit or before they have become a part of the general mass of property of the State. In other words, the contention attempts to apply to articles of illegitimate commerce the rule which marks the line between the exercise of Federal power and State power over articles of legitimate commerce. The contention misses the question in the case. There is here no conflict of jurisdiction over property legally articles of trade. The question here is whether articles which are outlaws of commerce may be seized wherever found, and it certainly will not be contended that they are outside the jurisdiction of the National Government when they are within the borders of a State. The question in the case therefore is, What power has Congress over such articles? Can they escape the consequences of their illegal transportation by being mingled at the place of destination with other property? To give them such immunity would defeat in many cases the provision for their confiscation, and their confiscation or destruction is the especial concern of the law. The power to do so is certainly appropriate to the right to bar them from interstate commerce and completes its purpose, which is not to prevent merely the physical movement of adulterated articles but the use of them, or rather to prevent trade in them between the States by denying to them the facilities of interstate commerce.

"From the above case it is clear that the powers of Congress over 'illicit' commerce is governed by different rules than those which determine and fix the powers of Congress over legitimate commerce. In legitimate commerce the line between State and Federal authority becomes important. In 'illicit' commerce no such question arises, for, as we have just seen, the National Government, acting for the Nation, can pursue adulterated articles even after they have gotten into the general mass of the property of the State, and, as we shall see presently, the State may itself forbid the importation into its boundaries of such articles.

"Upon the principles of these cases it is of course within the power of Congress to prohibit transportation companies from carrying from one State into another obscene books, pictures, or writings, or other matter of an indecent character, or any drug or article intended for producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral use, as was done by act of 1900 (ch. 553, s. 4, Federal Penal Code of 1910, sec. 245). All these things—e. g., lottery tickets, adulterated food, indecent articles—all are inherently detrimental in themselves to all the people of the United States. If the thing involves a moral question, it is wrong to the moral conscience of the whole United States as a nation, not a malum prohibitum set up by one State against another State. If it is a question of health, it affects everybody in the same way. Therefore they are prohibited and denied the facilities of interstate commerce. These characteristics are not created by Congress, because they exist in themselves, but they are taken notice of by Congress just as the courts take judicial cognizance of the universal character of their dangerous and harmful tendencies.

"I make this assertion without fear of contradiction: The United States Supreme Court has never decided that the carriage of any article as contraband of commerce could be constitutionally prohibited which article was not, by the substantially universal consent of the whole Nation, contraband of commerce, and is therefore marked out, cut off, and declared to be something that can not be carried from State to State.

"So, again, an article that is not a subject of commerce may be prohibited from being carried from State to State, but that is precisely because it is not a subject of commerce.

"Thus Congress, by what is known as the Lacey Act (1900, ch. 553, sec. 2, Federal Penal Code of 1910, sec. 242), prohibited the transportation of the dead bodies of wild animals or birds when they are killed or offered for shipment in violation of the law of the State where they were killed or offered for shipment. This act was declared constitutional in the case of Rupert v. United States (181 Fed., 87, 90), but that was only because the dead bodies of wild animals and birds killed or offered for shipment against the laws of the State are not the subjects of property in the usual sense, but are under the control of the State where they are killed or from which they are to be shipped. They are therefore, under these circumstances, not subjects of commerce at all. The court bases its decision on the case of Geer v. Connecticut (161 U. S., 519, followed in Oklahoma v. Kansas Nat. Gas Co., 221 U. S., 223), where the whole subject is elaborately discussed by the then Mr. Justice White.

"The other characteristics of 'outlaws of commerce' or 'contrabands of commerce' or things 'not subjects of commerce' is even more striking. That is that the States can prohibit their being carried from or into the borders of the State, something which can never be done by the States as to any objects of legitimate commerce.

"The authorities are full and conclusive on this question. To cite a few—

"In the case of Plumley v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts (155 U. S., 461) the law of Massachusetts was sustained which forbade the sale of oleomargarine, colored in imitation of yellow butter, even though the article was imported into the State and sold in the original package; that such a sale was not a violation of the commercial clause of the Constitution.

"The court says (italics ours), page 468:

"He (the importer) is only forbidden to practice in such matters a fraud upon the general public. The statute seeks to prevent false pretenses and to promote fair dealing in the sale of an article of food. It compels the sale of oleomargarine for what it really is by preventing its sale for what it is not. Can it be that the Constitution of the United States secures to anyone the privilege of manufacturing and selling an article of food in such manner as to induce the mass of the people to believe that they are buying something which, in fact, is something wholly different from that which is offered for sale? * * *

"Page 479:

"The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public. The deception against which the statute of Massachusetts is aimed is an offense against society; and the States are as competent to protect their people against such offenses or wrongs as they are to protect them against crimes or wrongs of more serious character.

"But in the case of Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S., 1) the Supreme Court of the United States held that a State could not prohibit the importation and sale of pure oleomargarine not deceptively colored, as this was a legitimate article of commerce.

"The Supreme Court, therefore, says to the States: 'You may keep out oleomargarine deceptively colored.' Why? Is it not an article of commerce? Yes; it is if it is pure and not deceptively colored. It is then an article of legitimate commerce, and you can not keep it out no matter what your local policy may be. But if it is colored for purposes of deception you can keep it out. Here you are dealing with fraud. It is fundamental that no man has the right to cheat another. It is not a local policy, but general—it is inherently wrong. Therefore, you can make oleomargarine 'contraband of commerce,' or an 'outlaw of commerce,' where it is put into such a condition as to deceive the people into thinking that it is butter, and such action on the part of the State will not contravene the commerce clause of the Constitution.

"The whole matter is summed up in the case of Bowman v. Chicago & North Western Co. (125 U. S.), where the Supreme Court says (p. 489):

"Doubtless the States have power to provide by law suitable measures to prevent the introduction into the States of articles of trade which, on account of their existing condition, would bring in and spread disease, pestilence, and death, such as rags or other substances infected with the germs of yellow fever or the virus of smallpox, or cattle or meat or other provisions that are diseased or decayed or otherwise, from their condition and quality, unfit for human use or consumption. Such articles are not merchantable; they are not legitimate subjects of trade and commerce. They may be rightly outlawed as intrinsically and directly the immediate sources and causes of destruction to human health and life. The self-protecting power of each State, therefore, may be rightfully exerted against their introduction, and such exercises of power can not be considered regulations of commerce prohibited by the Constitution. * * *

"(P. 490.) If from its nature it does not belong to commerce, or if its condition from putrescence or other cause is such, when it is about to enter a State, that it no longer belongs to commerce, or, in other words, is not a commercial article, then the State power may exclude its introduction.

"The same principles apply as to things that are not fully the subjects of property rights.

"Thus in Greer v. Connecticut (101 U. S., 519) it was held that the State has the right to prohibit the transportation of birds or game lawfully killed in the State, because these articles are feræ naturæ, subject only to such ownership as the State permits.

"From these authorities and others which could be cited it is clear that 'outlaws of commerce' are distinguished by sharp characteristics which never fail, and you can distinguish them as certainly as you tell a white man from a black man. If Congress is to prohibit their transportation they must be inherently wrong, as a shipment of deceitfully colored oleomargarine or a lottery ticket, and wrong quo ad the Nation as a whole.

"If it is an 'outlaw' of commerce, then it is not a thing with respect to which you can say to a State, 'You shall not forbid that thing to come within your borders,' or 'You shall not forbid it to go out.' You can do both, because it is not legitimate commerce, and not being legitimate commerce, the Constitution is not violated by such action.

"Now, coming back to this bill, wherein does it receive any support from the principles just enunciated as to 'outlaws of commerce.' Is intoxicating liquor an article of legitimate commerce, or is it outside of commerce? Do you not know that in every distillery in the United States there is a Government officer who watches everything that is done from the time of the buying of the grain until the distilled liquor is put into barrels—that the barrels are under the custody of a Government officer in a warehouse until the tax is paid? Do you not all know that a great part of our internal revenue taxes come from distilled spirits?

"Oleomargarine was decided to be an article of commerce, inter alia, because its manufacture was recognized by Congress and it was made the subject of Federal taxation. (Shollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S., 9.)

"So as to tobacco. The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of tobacco, in Austin v. Tennessee (179 U. S., 345), says (italics ours), page 345:

"Whatever product has, from time immemorial, been recognized by custom or law as a fit subject for barter and sale, particularly if its manufacture has been made the subject of Federal regulation and taxation, must, we think, be recognized as a legitimate article of commerce, although it may, to a certain extent, be within the police power of the States. Of this class of cases is tobacco.

"As to intoxicating liquors, the effect of a long line of decisions is summed up by the Supreme Court of the United States in Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Cook Brewing Co., decided January 22, 1912, where the court says it has been indisputably determined—

"(a) That beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce.
"(b) That it is not competent for any State to forbid any commerce carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.
"(c) That until such transportation is concluded by delivery to the consignee, such commodities do not become subject to State regulation restraining their sale or disposition.

"If, therefore, intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce; if the States can not exclude the shipment of such liquors from another State, then it is clear that the present bill can not be supported upon the theory that intoxicating liquors are 'outlaws' of commerce, nor can its validity be founded upon any of the cases cited above. Not only is this true, but the present bill does not itself purport to make intoxicating liquors 'outlaws' of commerce. It does not undertake to have Congress say that the use of intoxicating liquors is wrong in itself, or that such use is deleterious to all the citizens of the United States, or that such liquors shall be denied the facilities of interstate commerce. There is no attempt to repeal the internal-revenue laws taxing liquors and regulating distilleries. There is no withdrawal contemplated of the recognition by Congress of liquors being in themselves legitimate subjects of foreign and interstate commerce. Nothing of this sort is attempted. It is therefore only a subterfuge to try to show that the bill can be supported upon the theory that liquor shall be regarded as a 'nuisance' or an 'outlaw' of commerce.

"The bill on its face is evidently an attempt to have Congress assist some States in the enforcement of their police regulations of the liquor traffic as against the interests of other States which authorize the manufacture of liquors and desire as wide a market for them as possible.

"The question has been asked whether Congress could not make intoxicating liquors "outlaws of commerce" and prohibit their transportation from State to State.

"A complete answer, so far as this discussion is concerned, would be that this question does not now arise. The present bill does not pretend to really accomplish this purpose.

"But waiving this objection, let us try to frankly answer the question.

"Let it be remembered that Congress can not arbitrarily prevent interstate commerce in things which are in their own nature the subject of legitimate commerce. The power as to legitimate commerce is to regulate, not to prohibit. Congress could not prohibit commerce in wholesome meat or bread. This is conceded. So when Congress comes to consider things that may be classed as illegitimate commerce, it does not merely put articles in that class of its own arbitrary will, but recognizes the existence of characteristics in the article which in the common opinion of the country render it harmful or deleterious, just as the Supreme Court of the United States, in passing upon the validity of acts of the legislature dealing with such articles, takes judicial cognizance of their characteristics in determining whether the legislative act is arbitrary or not.

"Thus the Supreme Court of Tennessee decided that cigarettes were not legitimate articles of commerce because wholly noxious and deleterious to health and their use inherently bad and bad only, but the Supreme Court of the United States held that this was not so in such a way as to make them 'outlaws of commerce.' (Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S., 350, 367.)

"The difficulty of dealing with the question of the wholesale prohibition of interstate commerce in liquors is that it is difficult to realize the atmosphere under which such a question would come to be practical. The Lottery case furnishes an illustration. In early times in this country lotteries were not looked upon with disfavor. Churches and public buildings were built with their proceeds. They were fully authorized by the legislatures, but with the passing of time there came to be a complete revolution in sentiment, so that they were bad to the moral conscience of the whole country. And therefore the Supreme Court, taking judicial cognizance of this situation, said that lottery tickets were contraband of commerce, because everybody agreed that they were hurtful to everybody in the United States who indulged in their use—that lotteries were a widespread pestilence, going into every home and working harm.

"But this is not true as to the use of intoxicating liquors. There is no belief, shared by substantially the whole people of the United States, including the Government, that the use of intoxicating liquors is so inherently wrong and deleterious to the whole people that it should be prohibited or suppressed as lottery tickets are prohibited or suppressed.

"We know that its use is freely permitted among all the civilized people in the world; that its prohibition in countries like England, France, Germany, or Italy would be regarded as simply ridiculous; that foreign traffic in them is enormous and has been since the beginning of the Government; that even in this country, though it is subjected to numerous restrictions under the police power of the States, still its prohibition is attempted only in a part of the country. We know, further, that it is still recognized by the Government of the United States as a legitimate subject of commerce; that its distillation is regulated by the Government and that it is heavily taxed by the Government; that the real situation in this country is that a great majority of the people are in favor of its use, but its temperate use, whilst a large number of earnest and zealous people are in favor of its prohibition.

"If the sentiment as to the use of liquor ever grows, as did the sentiment as to lottery tickets, to such an extent that substantially the whole country will believe that the use of intoxicating liquor in any form as a beverage is inherently wrong and deleterious to the whole people—a state of things which I regard as wholly impossible in the very nature of things—then such a state of facts would justify Congress in recognizing it and passing a law excluding liquor from interstate commerce on the theory of the Lottery case. But it is scarcely practical for us to be considering now what Congress might legally do on an impossible state of facts. Of course, Congress could not declare liquor an 'outlaw of commerce' and still regulate its manufacture and tax it. All the internal-revenue laws relating to intoxicating liquors would, of course, have to be repealed.

"This bill does not purport to 'outlaw' intoxicating liquor. It is really an attempt to aid one State to enforce its police power at the expense of other States.

"This bill undertakes to say to Maryland, 'Your whisky is outlawed because it is going to be used in violation of the prohibition laws of another State.' What does that mean, gentlemen? It means that here you have two States with conflicting interests, does it not? Take two States, for illustration, one a prohibition State and one where whisky is manufactured. Here you have two States which are interested in different things, and interested in different ways about a thing which is a subject of commerce. One State wants it and the other does not want it. What was the interstate-commerce law passed for? Was not the interstate-commerce law passed for the very reason that there were conflicts of interest between this State and that State as to commerce—as to the interchange of commodities? And is it not a fundamental and final answer to this question to say that when you are dealing with interstate commerce, the interstate-commerce clause requires you not to deal simply with the idea of helping one State in its interest, in what it thinks is its interest, against the interests of another State? I think my brother who talked just before me was very frank about it, that the only way that this conclusive argument can be gotten around at all is to attempt to make this not a regulation of interstate commerce, but to make it contraband of commerce. Now, that, I say, is conclusively shown, can not be done in this case.

"Now, I deny the power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause to use the great power of the Government of the United States to aid one State as to its local police matters against another State. There is no authority that I know of, properly understood, that contains that principle.

"In one of the most recent cases in the Supreme Court of the United States the true principle of the interstate-commerce clause was stated.

"In Oklahoma v. The National Gas Co. (221 U. S., 229), the court says (italics ours), page 235:

"And yet we have said that in matters of foreign and interstate commerce there are no State lines. In such commerce, instead of the States, a new power appears and a new welfare, a welfare which transcends that of any State. But rather let us say that it is constituted of the welfare of all the States. * * *

"Here is involved simply an attempt to have Congress say to one State, 'Now, you have a prohibition law; you have been trying to enforce it and you do not succeed entirely. Why do you not succeed? Because here come in some goods from abroad, or from another State.' Now, Congress says, 'We will help that; we will take up that situation and we will endeavor, under the commerce clause, to so hedge things about that you can more perfectly enforce your law.' Where, under any section of the Constitution, does Congress get the right to supplement or aid or take the place of the purely police powers of the State? Because that is all it amounts to; and my brother Caldwell is perfectly right when he says it is not even that, it is not even a regulation of commerce, because, as you will see upon looking at these cases in the Supreme Court, that the power is exclusive, and there must be some uniform rule. Why? Because, in interstate commerce Congress deals as a nation; and, dealing as a nation, it deals as a unit; and, dealing as a unit, when it regulates it must be a uniform regulation, and therefore it must be something in the power of Congress to do. Congress can not adopt the police laws of the States.

"In the case of Rahrer (140 U. S., 545), the case you have already been over, it is said, page 562:

"Nor can Congress transfer legislative powers to a State, nor sanction a State law, in violation of the Constitution; and if it can adopt a State law as its own, it must be one that it would be competent for it to enact itself, and not a law passed in the exercise of the police power. * * * It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers, nor enlarge those of a State.

"Congress can not take up a law of the State and enact it as its own law unless it is the kind of law it could have enacted without referring to the State. These things, in other words, are so different, the police power dealing with the internal affairs of the State and interstate commerce dealing with this great Nation as a nation, these ideas are so disparate in a law that Congress can not, acting as a nation, acting as a unit, take up and pass a law by adopting a State law if that State law justifies itself only under the police powers of the State.

"Then, again, speaking now of the object of the interstate-commerce law of the Constitution, the same decision says that the object was undoubtedly to prevent 'commercial regulations partial in their character or contrary to the common interests.'

"'Common interests,' and 'common interests' in the language of the Supreme Court in that case, means the interests of the people of the United States as a Nation under the commerce clause. That is what it means.

"Gentlemen, that is about the view I wish to emphasize, and I want to reiterate, as earnestly as I possibly can, that this law can not be justified, constitutionally, under the contraband idea, of putting the thing out of commerce; nor can I see that it can possibly be a regulation of commerce, when it simply undertakes to help one State against another in its police regulations, taking something which that other State may pass, which Congress could not pass itself, and which is therefore contrary to the very decision which I have read.

"Senator NELSON. I want to call your attention to the Wilson law and point out that it is exactly on the lines of this bill. Before the Wilson law was passed the Supreme Court held that interstate commerce went to the extent of allowing the sale of the unbroken package, did it not?

"Mr. GANS. Yes, sir.

"Senator NELSON. Here is the Wilson law, and let us see how this bill follows it:

"Be it enacted, etc., That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

"Mr. GANS. Yes, sir.

"Senator NELSON. That is exactly what this bill says. It says that when liquor comes into any State it shall be subject to the laws of that State. Here is an exact model.

"Here the Federal Government relinquished its power over interstate commerce to the extent of allowing selling in the unbroken package. In this bill we propose to relinquish a little more of that power. This bill—I do not refer to the contract part of it, because that does not meet with my approval—the first part of the bill is identically in the language of the Wilson law, and this law meets fully the argument that this is a delegation of legislative authority. If it is a delegation of legislative authority in this case, it was also a delegation of authority to leave it to the laws of the State or Territory in reference to the disposing of it in the unbroken package. If there is a delegation of legislative authority in this case, there was also in the Wilson law.

"Mr. GANS. Now, will you allow me to answer that?

"Senator NELSON. Yes.

"Mr. GANS. Or try to answer it, I mean; because, to my mind, the answer is very clear, although you all may not think so. The answer is this, and it is fundamental: It is just exactly like it was with Shylock; it is not so hard to surrender your little finger, but when it comes to taking a slice out of your heart, it is different, is it not? In dealing with this question, the Wilson bill, as you have suggested, the court said what? Let me give the situation. Before the Wilson bill was passed there was the case of Leisy v. Hardin, in which they held that the power of Congress over interstate commerce extended not only from the time the consignor began to ship the goods to the time of its delivery to the consignee, but that it followed the sale in the original package by the consignee. This was the case of Leisy v. Hardin. The act of 1890 had this effect: It let go the power of Congress, so far as the sale in the unbroken package was concerned.

"Now, take the language of the Wilson law. By the language itself you could read it to mean that as soon as liquor got into the State it must be subject to the law of the State, but the Supreme Court of the United States took it up and said:

"It can not be. If you construe the language to mean that, then you are interfering with interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect; you are interfering with the transportation of goods from the consignor to the consignee. But when you let go the power over the sale in the original package you are not dealing with interstate commerce, per se, you are not dealing with a thing over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction; you are dealing with an incident of interstate commerce, a thing like a wharf, or a warehouse, over which the State has police power, unless Congress interferes. In other words, the jurisdiction over the original package being in the State under its police power, unless Congress prevents it, and if Congress takes off its hand, then what is restored? Does Congress give the State power to sell in the original package? No; Congress can not give the State anything. Congress simply takes off its concurrent supervisory jurisdiction, and the State police power, ex propria vigore, governs the sale of the package. That is the ground upon which they put it.

"Senator NELSON. No; they put it upon the ground that the liquor had not arrived in the State. They used the term 'arrival.' They said it had not arrived in the State until it had been delivered to the consignee.

"Mr. GANS. Yes.

"Senator NELSON. That was the real gist of the case.

"Mr. GANS. I have the language. It is Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., p. 424):

"Whilst it is true that the right to sell, free from State interference, interstate-commerce merchandise was held in Leisy v. Hardin to be an essential incident to interstate commerce, it was yet but an incident, as the contract of sale within a State in its nature was usually subject to the control of the legislative authority of the State. On the other hand, the power to contract for the transportation of merchandise from one State into or across another involved interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect and imported in its very essence a regulation which necessarily must be governed by laws apart from the laws of the several States, since it embraced a contract which must come under the laws of more than one State.

"Now, if that means anything it means that interstate commerce per se, going from the consignor to the consignee, is pure interstate commerce, with respect to which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction under the Constitution, and you all know perfectly well that if Congress is given by the Constitution exclusive power over that kind of interstate commerce (Southern Ry. v. King, 217 U. S., 531) it could not give any part of it to the State. If the power is in the State, where did the State get it? It never had it, and it can not be given it by Congress. But the authorities do say this, that when it comes to incidents of interstate commerce, such as selling in the original package, you have a thing which may be under the State or under Congress, as Congress chooses. That is all there is to it.

"Senator BORAH. In other words, if they had held that the Wilson law meant, by the word 'arrival,' when it physically entered the State, they would have made the law unconstitutional?

"Mr. GANS. Yes.

"Senator BORAH. And they held that it meant when the transaction was closed?

"Mr. GANS. Yes. They held that the sale in the original package was something that could be left to the State or not, at the option of Congress.

"Senator NELSON. Excuse me for having interrupted you.

"Mr. GANS. Certainly. I rather like it than otherwise. Now, I have only one other thing to say, and that is in respect to the delegation of power. The discussion which I have just made leads up to this, and therefore I regard it as supplemental to the very able discussion made by Mr. Maxwell.

"The point is that it is really not a regulation by Congress at all, but it is really delegating to the State the power to do something. It must be that, in essence, because Congress can not take up and adopt a law of the State when the thing which it does is something that Congress could not do itself. It therefore amounts to simply a regulation by the State and not by Congress.

"But look at the absurdity of the bill—I mean the legal absurdity, of course. Here is a case, and I will not read the language, where there is a shipment of liquor from one State to another, where the liquor is 'intended'—intended by whom? Intended when? "Intended by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States.' Intended by anybody connected, directly or indirectly, at any time, with the transaction, to violate the law of any State, with respect to which intention there is nothing in the bill—and they do not want it there—which connects knowledge of that intention with the consignor. Now, I ask you, gentlemen, as lawyers, all of you experienced lawyers, who have been dealing with weighty affairs all through your lives, did you, up to the time of reading this bill, ever hear of a proposition which fundamentally is so opposed to all principles of inherent justice as taking from me property in transit with respect to which I am entirely innocent on account of the fact that somebody, at some time, directly or indirectly connected with the transaction, may intend to violate the laws, no matter what the laws are, in regard to ale, in the original package or not, of another State; did anybody ever hear of anything like that?

"There are States, as you know perfectly well, where some counties are wet and some dry, and if the consignee lives in a city which is wet, to which the consignment goes, and if that consignee, without the knowledge of the consignor, intends to send some of that liquor to the dry counties, he intends to violate the law, and I am to be punished for that, although I have no way of finding out. Even though I asked him and he lied to me I would have forfeited my property.

"Then, if I sell to a consignee and he says that he intended or intends—in order to escape paying the bill when the bill comes in for the goods—to sell on Sunday, or after 12 o'clock at night, or to sell to a minor, or within a certain distance of a schoolhouse, or to do any one of those things which may be prohibited by the laws of his State, I am to be held to forfeit all my goods. Moreover, a thing can not be contraband of commerce unless it is contraband before it starts. Before it starts it must be a thing which is not a subject of commerce before it is put on the cars, because a thing would very rarely get to be contraband of commerce while it is going on the train.

"Here is a thing put on the train innocently by the consignor, an article manufactured under the laws of his State and recognized by the United States by its taxation and the policy of regulation as being an article of commerce, and yet because somebody intends, after it gets there, to violate the law of the State to which it is shipped it has been contraband of commerce from the beginning, under the rules I have indicated, and can be seized even in transit or seized at the other end. Now, with very great respect, that is supremely ridiculous, from my point of view. I do not believe there is a man who has any inherent sense of right who could believe that a consignor should be deprived of his property under these circumstances; and yet that is what is intended here.

"Senator DILLINGHAM. How would this law differ in principle from one that was framed in the same manner and made to apply to the ordinary poisons that are used among druggists, and to opiates, and to firearms, and to things of that kind that might be used legally or might be used illegally?

"Mr. GANS. I think that the State, under its police power, can pass laws relative to the use of dangerous things.

"Senator NELSON. We have a law governing the shipment of dynamite.

"Mr. GANS. Yes; but that comes under danger in transportation.

"Senator DILLINGHAM. Yes; but if Congress had power to pass this law, would they have the power to pass laws in relation to these other things?

"Mr. GANS. Yes; Congress could under that theory go into the whole matter and pass police regulations in regard to anything alleged to be dangerous in its use. This is a sort of entering wedge, by which Congress, under the interstate-commerce power, would take police jurisdiction. I do not see where it is to stop. All that they have to do is to have some reason for saying that the thing which you are going to ship is going to do harm to the people where you ship it, under their legal ideas or their traditions, and you could grasp and hold, therefore, in the Government of the United States a vast area of power which is now exclusively in the States.

"Mr. CALDWELL. Might I ask you a question?

"Mr. GANS. Certainly.

"Mr. CALDWELL. Is it not true that under the law as it now is an original package might be seized in the hands of the consignee immediately after delivery, at the point of destination, and confiscated if the consignee intends to use it in violation of the law, and all that notwithstanding whether the liquor had been sold on credit or not?

"Mr. GANS. That is true.

"Mr. CALDWELL. And the innocence of the vender?

"Mr. GANS. Yes.

"Mr. CALDWELL. So that this simply moves it up to the delivery prior to the point of destination; that is all, is it not?

"Mr. GANS. That is all, because it is everything. It moves along an impossible path; that is all. The only reason why the package you represent could be seized in the hands of the consignee is that when it gets there, under the law of 1890, it is under the control of the State, and the State has control of it inherently and originally. The United States has a right to take that control away; but if it leaves its hands off, then the State has control; but the State has no control, and never did have any control, over goods in transit."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I did state that in my opinion this bill is constitutional, and I did not have much doubt on the question. That was true until I heard the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] say it is of doubtful constitutional authority; but now I do not know whether my assertion should stand, because I infer Mr. SHERLEY is a great lawyer and will admit it himself upon the slightest provocation. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, this bill shall receive my support as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary, and not a single one of these amendments shall have my support, because in my judgment they do not come from the friends of the legislation and are not necessary or proper.

I believe we have the constitutional right to pass this measure, and all the refinement of logic in the world can not convince me that Congress with plenary power to regulate interstate commerce can not regulate the liquor traffic as we are undertaking to do this day. Ah, but gentlemen say you ought to insert a penalty in this act. Why do you want a penalty and thus throw this matter into the Federal courts? Why not remand subject to the State courts and inforce the law there?

Here is the analysis: Let anyone undertake to ship liquor into a State or locality where is prohibition, and then let it be established that it is shipped to such locality with an intention to violate the law, and in the State court no man can plead in defense that it is interstate commerce and that the State is interfering with interstate commerce, because the prosecuting attorney will say, "We have established that you have shipped this liquor with a guilty intention and you have no right to that defense, because the Federal Government has put an embargo on this character of liquor traffic and you can not violate the laws of the State or a prohibition locality.

How can any Democrat refuse to vote for such a doctrine? How can any gentleman who believes in local self-government, no matter to what party he may belong, fail to vote for it? Ah, the distinguished ex-Speaker of the House, Mr. CANNON, said there are more saloons in Maine and more liquor in that State than in any other State he ever visited. Yes; but if you will pass this law there will no longer be bootleggers there to violate the law by pleading the interstate-commerce defense. That defense will be taken away by congressional enactment, and that is precisely what we propose to-day.

If you are going to amend it, let the friends of the measure offer the amendments. Therefore, I shall vote against the personal-use amendment also, because if there is a right under the Constitution to ship liquor into any locality for personal use or consumption, and not for sale, then this bill does not take that right away from any person. If they have the right to do it under the Constitution the United States Supreme Court has said that Congress can not take that privilege away. Therefore my vote shall be recorded for the act unimpaired, as presented by the Judiciary Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that more men drink because they are miserable than are miserable because they drink. [Laughter and applause.] The failure to recognize that fact has been the cause of more legislation which will retard the progress of the temperance movement than anything else that has happened in this country, because it is aimed at the effect and not at the cause.

I want to show from the testimony of the Antisaloon League representatives that the principal trouble which now exists is due to the fact that the States will not enforce their own laws.

I want to point out that in countries like Italy the United States consuls say that they seldom see anybody in a drunken condition because the people are taught to use and not to abuse liquor—they are not forbidden to use it.

I want to discuss the constitutional question, and, more than all, I want to quote at this time a statement made by Mr. Anderson, the representative of the Antisaloon League of Maryland; and I wish that those who have any doubt about the constitutionality of this proposed law would listen to his statement.

Mr. Anderson, who appeared before the Judiciary Committee on the hearings upon this bill, representing the Antisaloon League of Maryland, said this:

I think no Member of the legislative body ought to yield to mere clamor and pass something that he is morally certain is not constitutional. I should say, very frankly, it would be cowardly to pass something that a man knew was unconstitutional and put the responsibility on somebody else.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

My views as to the constitutional question are set forth in the minority report signed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] and by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] and myself, which reads as follows:

Minority views. To accompany H. R. 17593.

Being unable to agree with the views expressed by the majority members of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 17593, intended to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases, which bill has been favorably reported with amendments, we beg leave to submit herewith our views in opposition to the enactment of said measure.

The effect of the bill proposed, if enacted into law, will be to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate character whenever they are intended by any person interested therein to be in any manner used in violation of any law of any State or Territory to which they may be shipped, and their transportation in interstate commerce is thereupon absolutely prohibited.

In the consideration of this bill a few fundamental and well-established principles of law should be kept in mind.

1. Ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale, and beer are subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic like any other commodity in which a right of traffic exists, and are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world, the laws of Congress, by our treaties with foreign nations, and by the decisions of the courts. (Leisy v. Harden, 135 U. S., 100.)

2. The power to regulate interstate commerce is vested exclusively in Congress by Article I of section 8 of the Constitution of the United States, and that Congress can neither delegate this power nor enlarge the power of the States in reference thereto. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 562.)

3. This constitutional protection of Congress over interstate shipments can not be divested until the goods have been delivered into the hands of the consignee, and until such delivery they can not be subjected to the operation of State laws. (Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S., 412.)

This bill if enacted into law contravenes every one of these organic and vital principles, the establishment of which was one of the chief causes leading to the adoption of the Constitution. Under the guise of a congressional regulation it makes alcoholic liquors contraband in certain specified cases; it creates a distinction between legal and illegal shipments based upon the varying laws of the different States, thereby delegating to the States the power of regulating interstate commerce, and it strikes down the constitutional protection to a commodity that is the legitimate subject of interstate commerce, prevents its delivery to the consignee, and subjects it to the operation of a State law as soon as it crosses the border of a State.

This bill and others of similar import are unlike any other bills that have heretofore sought to accomplish this purpose. Bills have been introduced seeking to outlaw all traffic in intoxicating liquors by the exercise of the police power which Congress may possess under its plenary powers over interstate commerce. Bills have been introduced expressly declaring that the dominion of Congress over interstate shipments of liquor should cease upon its arrival within the borders of a State and before delivery to the consignee. These propositions which openly and squarely present to Congress the economic and legal questions involved have not been pressed for obvious reasons. In the first case, if Congress had the power and should declare all liquors contraband, it would do so at the cost of $250,000,000 yearly revenue which it receives from the manufacture and sale of this product. In the second case, the attempt by Congress to relinquish control over interstate shipments before delivery to the consignee is such an abandonment of its constitutional power over interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect as to render it unconstitutional.

The bill, in our judgment, seeks to accomplish both of these purposes by indirection and to avoid the inevitable consequences that attach to the direct method above referred to. Let us examine it carefully and see if it can be successfully done.

Its proponents say:

"The bill does not exclude alcoholic liquor from interstate commerce; that it is a regulation made by Congress itself; that the restrictions imposed are all to be found within the bill; that it is uniform in its operation; that it does not subject interstate shipments to the operation of State laws, but that it divests them of their constitutional protection only when some one or more of the parties interested therein intend to violate a State law."

In order to understand the application of the bill let us take a concrete, practical illustration of its operation. A dealer or a manufacturer in Philadelphia has in his possession and for sale in bulk alcoholic liquors. He receives an order from a wholesaler in the State of Pennsylvania, and his commodity is without question and without restrictions transported in intrastate commerce. By the same mail he receives an order for the same goods from another State, and this same commodity, which is the subject of barter and sale by all the civilized nations of the earth, by the acts of Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court, is given a new status; it is permitted transportation only upon the condition that all the parties interested in the transaction intend to obey the laws of the State to which the consignment is made. The merchant or manufacturer in this case, and the railroads and other interstate transportation companies, are by this bill denied the usual and ordinary presumptions of law that every man intends to do his duty and to obey the laws of the land, but they must, at their peril, ascertain the actual undisclosed intent of the consignee respecting his intention to violate the laws of the State to which shipment is to be made. That actual intention can be legally determined only by a judicial trial in which a consideration of the question, "What are the laws of the State the intention to violate which is alleged?" must be a primary inquiry, because the intention to violate could be deduced only from the provisions of the law itself.

In Pennsylvania, where every licensed dealer has a right to vend liquors freely, the intent to violate would consist of an intention to sell without a license; in Iowa or in Oklahoma, where the sale of liquor is absolutely prohibited, it might be deduced from the mere possession of liquor. If some State in the future should prohibit the personal use of intoxicating liquor, as well as the sale and traffic therein, the mere giving of the order for shipment might be conclusive evidence of intention to violate. So that it must be apparent to every thoughtful mind that the controlling factors in determining the status of intoxicating liquors ordered by mail from the merchant or manufacturer before alluded to are the rigor or liberality, the restrictions or the absence thereof, in the laws of the various States to which the consignments are to be made, to which may be added the vagaries of the trier of the fact as to intention, and that the State law therefore regulates.

The distinction sought to be drawn by the proponents of this bill between its provisions and the provisions of a bill which would in terms submit interstate shipments of liquor to the States as soon as it crosses their borders, is, in our judgment, a thinly veiled sophistry and totally unsound. In the one case the commodity would be in terms subjected to the laws of the State immediately. By this bill the application of the State law would be postponed one stage and the commodity would be submitted to it immediately; that is, when these laws are crystallized into definite form by having influenced the intention of the consignee or other person.

All laws are but the abstract regulation of conduct. They take concrete form, and punishment is inflicted only when the intention to violate them is established. The law itself is the rule of conduct. The intent to violate is the offense, and the punishment for the violation is but the enforcement of the law. Therefore, to interdict interstate commerce in a legitimate commodity as a penalty for the intention to disobey a State law is, in legal effect, clearly an attempt to enforce a State law in the regulation of interstate commerce.

The application of this law will also be influenced by future State legislation. The character of State laws respecting the liquor traffic will change from year to year. A "dry" State to-day may be a "wet" State to-morrow. The converse of that proposition is equally true. A "wet" State may in the future absolutely prohibit the sale of liquor, or may even go to the point of prohibiting its personal use. The temptation and incentive of the consignee of intoxicating liquors to intend to violate a State law will therefore vary from year to year, as the attitude of the State law shall vary in its regulation of the traffic.

We have confined ourselves to the consideration of one aspect of the bill only. That it is open to many other insuperable legal objections, we are well aware. The attempt to make the action of A illegal and to inflict upon him a penalty because of this undisclosed and undiscoverable intent of other parties is a startling novelty in legislation—so violative of all of the principles and traditions of the common law from which we have drawn our jurisprudence and so fundamentally dangerous in its application, that it challenges the very foundations of justice itself. But we leave the enlargement and discussion of this to others, contenting ourselves with demonstrating the lack of power on the part of Congress for obvious constitutional reasons to pass the bill.

R. O. MOON.
H. GARLAND DUPRÉ.
WALTER I. MCCOY.

The statement of Mr. Maxwell, an attorney who appeared before the Judiciary Committee, is the clearest exposition of the fundamental constitutional objections to the Webb bill, and his position was successfully maintained under the fire not only of members of the committee, but also of the advocates of the bill present when he offered his views. I can not easily summarize his statement, so give it in full. It is as follows:

In other words, this proposed statute prohibits the transportation from any foreign country or from any State into any State or Territory or District of the United States of ardent spirits, beer, ale, or wine which are intended by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of the State, Territory, or District to which the liquor is to be transported, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District, and any and all contracts pertaining to such transactions are declared to be null and void.

We submit that this bill is unconstitutional because it delegates to the States the power to regulate interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect. The power to regulate interstate commerce, as the Supreme Court has said, is the power to prescribe the rules by which such commerce is to be governed. This bill attempts, of course, a regulation of interstate commerce; otherwise it would not be within the power of Congress to pass it. How does it regulate interstate commerce? By any rule which Congress itself establishes? Not at all, but by a rule which the State establishes. If there is no State law, there is no regulation. If there is a State law, the regulation is determined by that State law. The repeal of that State law repeals the regulation. The amendment of the State law amends the regulation. In the absence of a State law there is no regulation whatever. The extent and measure and duration of the regulation is dependent entirely upon the law of the State. Therefore, this proposed bill undertakes to delegate the regulation of interstate commerce to the laws of the State; to leave it to the State to say when spirits may be carried in interstate commerce, to what extent they may be carried in interstate commerce, and the various limitations which the States may impose upon the transportation of spirits in interstate commerce.

Mr. WEBB. May I ask you a question?

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEBB. Do you think that Congress has power under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to prohibit the shipment of all whisky in interstate commerce, if it chooses to do so?

Mr. MAXWELL. That question is not here. That is a difficult question, and one which is not involved at all in this bill, because Congress does not by this bill undertake to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of ardent spirits.

Mr. WEBB. It would be involved to this effect: If Congress has the plenary power to prohibit the shipment of all whisky in interstate commerce, having that plenary power, it could do anything which involved a lesser exercise of power; that is, it could prohibit any kind of whisky for any sort of reason. Now, if it could prohibit all whisky without any reason, then it certainly follows that the lesser power is included in the larger, and Congress could prohibit the shipment of any sort of whisky, for any sort of purpose, in violation of any sort of law, rule, or regulation.

Mr. MAXWELL. Which Congress itself prescribes.

Mr. WEBB. I did not see that——

Mr. MAXWELL. But Congress can not fix the rule by which any article of commerce shall be transported in interstate commerce solely with reference to some rule which the State may enact.

Mr. WEBB. I was going to say, though, if Congress has the power to prohibit its shipment entirely and arbitrarily, without assigning any reason at all, it can certainly prohibit any part of this commerce for any reason it pleases to assign, because all of those reasons apply to the exercise of a smaller power and the smaller power is included in the larger one.

Mr. MAXWELL. But Congress must prescribe. If Congress wants to impose regulation, Congress must determine for itself what the regulation shall be, so that the extent and duration of that regulation shall be discovered from the declaration of Congress, and not by the declaration of the State. By this bill Congress does not undertake to say that the transportation of wine, beer, or spirits in interstate commerce is prohibited, or when it shall be prohibited according to any rule prescribed by Congress. Congress is asked by this bill to leave to the various States the enactment of the law which gives vitality to the act of Congress.

Mr. WEBB. In that line, may I suggest this: That in 1900 Congress passed a law, and such men as Judge De Armond, who once graced this committee, voted for it, providing that it should be unlawful to ship in interstate commerce any dead birds or the bodies of animals killed in violation of the laws of the States.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. But permitting the shipment in interstate commerce of the bodies of such dead birds and animals provided the State law permitted the shipment. That statute has been in existence since 1900. It was passed by both Houses. Such men as Senator Bailey and Judge De Armond and other great lawyers voted for it, thereby saying that it was constitutional. On the call of the roll in the House it passed by a vote of 37 to 130. I just suggest that there Congress undertook to predicate legislation upon State law, and that law has been to the circuit court twice in the last 12 years and has not been declared unconstitutional.

Mr. MAXWELL. I am glad you called my attention to that statute. There is a striking difference between the statute now proposed and this statute to which you refer. That prohibited the transportation from a State, in interstate commerce, of what? Of an article which was not an article of commerce. The wild animals and birds which are the subject of that statute are feræ naturæ, in which there is no right of property, even after capture, except by the authority and the permission of the State. That game existed as property by virtue of the law of the State in which it was, and if by the law of that State it was denied the right of property, that being within the undoubted power of the State, it then could be treated by Congress as something which was not an article of commerce. What Congress did by that law was simply to say that articles which are not the subject of property—there could be no larceny of such articles at common law—shall not be carried in interstate commerce. That is the whole of that law.

Mr. WEBB. You do not mean to say that birds and animals are not articles of commerce? If they were not, Congress would have no power over them. The first question the court must decide is, Is this thing the subject of interstate commerce? As you will remember, that was the great discussion that they had in the Lottery case. Some of the judges held that lottery tickets were not interstate commerce, and the court held that they must be subjects of interstate commerce before Congress could act at all. The argument you make was never made in the discussion of this game bill on the floor of the House. The court holds that birds are subjects of interstate commerce and subject to the control of Congress. If they were not subject to the control of Congress, Congress would have nothing to do with them.

Mr. MAXWELL. Congress had the right to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce by a rule which it prescribes. It would not depend at all upon the law of any State except the law of the State in which the wild animals or birds were, a law which in the exercise of the power of that State declared them not to be articles of commerce. They were not property. But as to ardent spirits, I quote from the words of Chief Justice Fuller, in the case of Leisy v. Hardin:

"Ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale, and beer are subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic, like any other commodity in which a right of traffic exists, and are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world, the laws of Congress, and the decisions of courts."

Mr. MOON. Is it not true that the only way that Congress could ever eliminate the transportation of liquor through interstate commerce is by declaring that it is not an article of commerce?

Mr. MAXWELL. That is the only way.

Mr. MOON. Like diseased cattle?

Mr. MAXWELL. Diseased cattle are not an article of commerce. Congress may declare, but it declares by its own rule, and can not delegate to any State the power to say what is an article of commerce, if it is a commodity which, by the recognized usages of the commercial world, and by the acts of Congress, is an article of commerce.

Mr. WEBB. Do you think that Congress can arbitrarily declare what is and what is not interstate commerce?

Mr. MAXWELL. Probably not. Congress is doubtless limited by other provisions of the Constitution. In the Lottery case we are not confronted with any question of a delegation of power by Congress. Congress did not prohibit the transportation of lottery tickets to or from States according to whether the States declared such transportation to be illegal. Congress declared its own rule. Congress provided that the transportation of lottery tickets should be forbidden.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Maxwell, in answer to that question, is not this true: That if there was a preponderant public sentiment throughout this country that intoxicating liquors were inimical to the best interests of the country, under the exercise of the police power of Congress they could declare liquor to be not a legitimate subject of commerce?

Mr. MAXWELL. That is a very strong presentation of the question. I am not prepared to dispute that.

Mr. CARLIN. In the Lottery case, is it not a fact that the Supreme Court based its decision upon this ground, that the States having delegated to Congress the power to regulate and control interstate commerce, they at the same time delegated over interstate commerce the police power; and is it not a fact that the Lottery case was upheld upon the ground that that was an exercise of the police power of Congress?

Mr. MAXWELL. I so understand the case, and the exercise of the police power might perhaps extend to the declaration by Congress that ardent spirits should not be transported in interstate commerce.

Mr. CARLIN. In other words, your contention is that Congress could perhaps altogether prohibit the transportation of liquors in interstate commerce, or Congress could regulate it, but that this is neither prohibition nor regulation, as it is dependent upon the action of the State law to make it either?

Mr. MAXWELL. Wholly. Suppose there is no State law; this bill is a dead letter. It accomplishes nothing; it does not regulate. Suppose the State law prohibits absolutely the use of intoxicating liquors, and the possession of intoxicating liquors, as well as traffic in intoxicating liquors, as the State perhaps might do; then the regulation of interstate commerce becomes, solely by virtue of that legislation of the State, a regulation against its transportation into the State for use by the individual, or for possession by the individual, as well as for sale by the individual. Suppose the legislature abolishes that law; then the regulation of interstate commerce is abolished. Suppose the legislature, in the exercise of its police power, regulates by reposing authority in a municipal body, in the council of a city, in selectmen, or in the voters of a residential district of a city, as we have it in Ohio; then the regulation of interstate commerce is measured by the rule which the State adopts. If that rule is repealed, the regulation is gone. If that rule is modified, the regulation is modified. The fundamental objection to this bill, the objection to which I address myself, the objection which to me is insurmountable, is that Congress by this bill is asked to delegate to the States the regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. MOON. Would not the interpretation of this very bill be different in two different States?

Mr. MAXWELL. Absolutely, and there might be different interpretations in the same State, according to the decisions of the courts of that State.

Mr. WEBB. There would be differences of law, too, because some States have no laws against killing birds, and some States have laws against the shipment of game birds, and nobody can ship them.

Mr. MAXWELL. Then if the bird is property, which it may or may not be, according to the law of the State in which it is killed, Congress does not prohibit its transportation. If it is not property by the law of that State it is not an article of commerce at all, and Congress for that reason prohibits its transportation. The bill now under consideration is entirely different. It deals with commodities which are admitted articles of commerce. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. F. W. Cook Brewing Co., decided by the Supreme Court on January 22, 1912, the court said:

"By a long line of decisions, beginning even prior to Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), it has been indisputably determined that beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce."

This bill has no force, no effect, no vitality, no significance, except as it attempts to delegate to the States the power to regulate interstate shipments of commodities which, as the Supreme Court says, "are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce."

Mr. WEBB. Is not that the exercise of a smaller power than the prohibition of all interstate shipment of whisky?

Mr. MAXWELL. No; it is nothing in the world but the delegation by Congress to the State of the power to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. WEBB. I think it is our regulating commerce; making it depends upon the regulation of the State.

Mr. MAXWELL. That is, leaving it to the State to say whether the interstate transportation of ardent spirits, wine, ale, or beer shall be prohibited or regulate; leaving it to the State to say whether it shall be, and, if it shall be, to what extent. How can you get away from the plain proposition that in the absence of State legislation this law has no vitality or effect?

Mr. WEBB. Do you think we could prohibit the shipment of whisky into any State that prohibits the importation of whisky?

Mr. MAXWELL. Not at all; because you take away from Congress the regulation and delegate that power to the State.

Mr. WEBB. That argument strikes me in this way: Conceding that Congress has a right to destroy the entire body, it has no right to cut off a finger or a toe or a foot. It has the right to destroy the entire commerce in whisky, and yet we can not destroy the commerce in the States where they say it shall not be sold. If Congress has the exclusive power to destroy the entire commerce in whisky, it strikes me it has the power to destroy any part of it for any reason it may assign.

Mr. MAXWELL. Not by the rule, or for any reason you assign. Congress has nothing to do with that statute except to pass it. But, then, whether it is regulation, or what is the extent of the regulation, depends wholly upon a rule which the State prescribes.

Mr. WEBB. Then we say if whisky is being imported in violation of the law of these sovereign States, laws such as these sovereign States have a right to make, then Congress prohibits the importation?

Mr. MAXWELL. True, Congress prohibits the importation; but the States say that it shall be prohibited.

Mr. WEBB. That is right.

Mr. MAXWELL. Only to the extent that the States say. The moment that the State law is repealed the regulation is gone. The minute the State law is modified the regulation is modified. It is a regulation which has no force or vitality except as it is given life or affected by the varying laws of the States.

I have before me the case of In re Rahrer, from which I ask leave to read this short passage from the opinion of the Chief Justice in 140 U. S., page 562:

"It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State."

The various forms of regulations which would be engrafted upon interstate commerce by this bill are as many as the various modes of regulation which have been and may be adopted by the States. The regulation may extend to prohibition; it may extend to possession; it may extend to use—for the personal use of the person who receives it. It may be county regulation; it may be township regulation; it may be city regulation; it may be regulation of a residential district in a city; it may be regulation that is imposed for the purpose of providing a monopoly in the commodity, general or special; and if this bill becomes a law, instead of a uniform rule prescribed by Congress, you will have as many different rules as there may be methods of regulation adopted by the various States. It may be a regulation which rests in some State officer, some county officer, some township officer, some municipal officer, some ward officer.

The lottery case is not subject to the objection which is urged to this bill. Section 242 of the criminal code, prohibiting the transportation in interstate commerce of game which, by the law of the State where it is killed, is not property, is not subject to the objections that are urged to this bill.

Attention was also called at one of the hearings to section 289 of the criminal code. Notice the difference between that section and the bill which is here proposed. Section 289 adopted the laws of the States for punishing acts committed within the territorial limits of the States, but within or upon places now existing or hereafter reserved or acquired by the United States. That was simply adopting the criminal laws of the States then in existence.

Mr. MOON. Let me interrupt you there. That is not adopting the criminal laws of the States?

Mr. MAXWELL. No.

Mr. MOON. It is reenacting the criminal laws of the States and making them Federal laws. We can not adopt State laws.

Mr. MAXWELL. No; Congress can not adopt State laws; it can reenact them.

But does that section allow these laws to be changed or varied by the action of the State? That section expressly provides, "by the laws thereof now in force, and every such State, Territorial, or District law shall, for the purposes of this section, continue in force notwithstanding any subsequent repeal or amendment thereof by any such State, Territory, or District."

So that Congress itself, by that section, adopted a law. It did not leave it to the States to vary that law.

Mr. MOON. And it adopted it because the Supreme Court of the United States had expressly declared that it could not permit a State to legislate for it.

Mr. MAXWELL. That was the reason which led to the adoption. But when Congress passed this section it adopted the rule of law which Congress then determined should be adopted, and it provided that that rule of law should remain in force notwithstanding any repeal or modification of the State law by the State.

Mr. WEBB. And in every State they came to there might have been different criminal laws; in some no criminal laws with reference to action on this.

Mr. MAXWELL. Congress determined what criminal law should be in force. Congress did not leave it to any State. It examined the criminal laws of the States, and by adoption enacted them, and expressly provided that any repeal of those laws by the States should not affect their existence as laws of the United States by virtue of that section.

Mr. WEBB. And there are as many different criminal laws in the various States as there are States?

Mr. MAXWELL. That is because Congress itself declared the rule. It has not delegated any power. It has expressly provided that the statute shall not be treated as a delegation of power. The statute is the statute that Congress passed, and the rule is the rule that Congress determined upon.

Mr. CARLIN. To make that applicable to this bill, your contention is that the States having already enacted laws pertaining to this particular subject, Congress could reenact them into Federal statutes, but could not leave it open to the States themselves to enact, under a general provision of this sort?

Mr. MAXWELL. Exactly so.

Mr. MOON. No; that does not follow. Bear in mind that that relates to property only over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction, which happens to be situated in the States. They could not exercise power over any property but that—

Mr. CARLIN. Over which Congress has territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. MOON. Yes; territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. MAXWELL. Territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. MOON. Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over interstate commerce.

Mr. MAXWELL. Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over interstate commerce. Whether Congress should exercise that jurisdiction by enacting a regulation or uniform law which should be applicable to all of the States alike is not a question which is involved here. It may be, perhaps, that Congress, in the exercise of its exclusive jurisdiction over interstate commerce, might say that no ardent spirits shall be transported into Oklahoma or into North Carolina or into some other State. Assuming that Congress would have the authority to pass a bill regulating interstate commerce which should not be uniform in its operation, but be directed against the introduction of ardent spirits into particular States, it would be the act of Congress which determined the regulation; and that regulation would endure because Congress enacted it, and would last as long as Congress maintained that regulation, and the regulation would not be dependent upon the action of the State of Oklahoma or of the State of North Carolina. You come back, every turn you take, to the fundamental objection, and as I contend, the fundamental and insurmountable objection to this bill, that it imposes a regulation upon interstate commerce by leaving the regulation wholly to the States, by delegating to the States the power to regulate interstate commerce, which is a power that can not be delegated by Congress.

Mr. MOON. Do you concede that Congress has the power to adopt regulations of interstate commerce which shall not be uniform?

Mr. MAXWELL. I do not. I presented that illustration simply for the purpose of showing the difference between a rule that is prescribed by Congress itself and one which is prescribed by a State. If Congress has the authority to say that wine, beer, and other liquors shall not be transported into the State of Oklahoma, then Congress acts. If Congress says that ardent spirits shall not be transported into the State of Oklahoma, provided the State of Oklahoma says they shall not be, then Congress delegates to the State of Oklahoma the regulation of interstate commerce by that State.

Mr. HOUSTON. What if Congress should provide that liquor should not be shipped in violation of the laws in the States now in existence?

Mr. MAXWELL. Laws now in existence?

Mr. HOUSTON. Which is intended to be used in violation of laws now in existence in the States, just as it is in the Territories, as you referred to in reference to the criminal code.

Mr. MAXWELL. That would present only the objection to the act as not being a uniform regulation of interstate commerce; but it would not be subject to the objection which this bill presents. If Congress should pass the act which you have just suggested, then the prohibition of the transportation of ardent spirits in interstate commerce into the State would be because Congress had itself adopted the rule by referring to the rule now in existence. The rule would be measured by the laws now in existence in the State. The rule would endure, although those laws might be repealed. The rule would be the same, notwithstanding any modification of those laws by the States, and the rule would not be applied to any future laws of the States or to any States in which laws should be enacted in the future.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, upon the question of uniformity, you will see that there could not be uniformity between the criminal laws of Territories over which the United States had jurisdiction and the laws of contiguous States.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. That difficulty exists there, of course?

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes; but, then, that is a law which is passed not in the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, but in the exercise of the power of Congress to legislate for territory belonging to the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Congress has jurisdiction over a Territory of the United States.

Mr. MAXWELL. It has as to its code and form of government.

Mr. DAVIS. The legislation of Congress as to its Territories has not been uniform in many respects.

Mr. MAXWELL. No; it has not been. It has never been supposed that the regulation of the affairs of a State or Territory must be by a uniform rule. It must necessarily be with respect to the local conditions and circumstances. But with respect to interstate commerce the constitutional provision was for the very purpose——

Mr. MOON. I have no recollection of any criminal law that was ever passed for the Territories that was not uniform throughout the Territories. We organize the Territories under the act of Congress, and give them the power of passing local laws; but whenever Congress has passed a law for a Territory I think you will find it has been uniform with the law throughout all the other Territories. Laws have been passed for all the Territories, uniform throughout all the Territories.

Mr. HOUSTON. Suppose so; but when Congress provides that a law shall be uniform in accordance with the laws of the States contiguous thereto, that might not produce uniformity, of course.

Mr. MOON. No; I know of but one provision of the Constitution that requires uniformity, and that is in the levying of impost duties. The Wilson Act of 1890 offended against the rule laid down. There the legislation with reference to whisky clearly does not apply to anything else in the United States except liquors that have been shipped in violation of the laws of the State. There they took away what one great Chief Justice said was the right to sell in commerce after it left the hands of the original consignee. That applies to whisky and does not apply to any other goods that I know of.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would you say that the regulation of interstate commerce must be uniform throughout the States?

Mr. MAXWELL. I am not prepared to say that. That question is not involved in this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, but it relates to the objection you are making to this bill.

Mr. MAXWELL. No; the objection to this bill is not that Congress might not undertake to prescribe by its own rules the regulation of interstate commerce. My objection to this bill is that the regulation is committed entirely to the States.

Mr. LITTLETON. Suppose it was a fixed condition in the State and not a changing condition, and suppose that applied to one-half of the States, do you think that Congress would have the right of its own power to prescribe a rule governing one half of the States which did not apply to the other half of the States?

Mr. MAXWELL. I do not think Congress would ever think of adopting that sort of a rule.

Mr. LITTLETON. No; but I am speaking of the question of law.

Mr. MAXWELL. No; I think not. The very purpose of adopting the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution was to have Congress regulate it by a uniform rule, made by Congress itself, without reference to the varying rules of the States. Now, the Wilson bill did what?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the act of 1890 which you referred to?

Mr. MAXWELL. That was the act of 1890. The first in the history of the cases on this general subject were the License cases. They were decided upon the ground that the act of New Hampshire, although it was considered to be a regulation of interstate commerce, was valid because Congress had not acted. The Supreme Court of the United States took the view, which was adhered to for a long time in respect of interstate commerce, that the States might act if Congress had not acted. But that rule is now completely repudiated, and the rule is that no State shall adopt any rule which directly regulates interstate commerce; that the failure of Congress to pass a law on the subject does not confer upon the State power to pass a law.

Mr. MOON. In other words, the failure of Congress to act means that it is the opinion of Congress that commerce shall remain free?

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes; that commerce shall remain free.

Mr. CARLIN. Before we come to the discussion of the Wilson bill let me ask you this: Would it be your interpretation of this bill that it might affect the shipment in interstate commerce of this commodity through a dry State to another State that was not dry?

Mr. MAXWELL. It might.

Mr. THOMAS. Would it affect it in transit, do you mean?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; affect the shipment of it by seizure. If, for instance, Virginia was dry and had a statute that no liquor should be shipped into it, would that law prevent liquor being shipped through that State into North Carolina as interstate commerce from New York, we will say, or Pennsylvania?

Mr. MAXWELL. That I understand to be the result, upon a fair construction of this bill.

Mr. WEBB. How? Just point out how?

Mr. MAXWELL. Because it declares that the transaction is invalid; from the beginning it is invalid.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; but the man who seizes it has got to prove it.

Mr. NORRIS. It is only invalid when the intention is to violate the law of the State into which it is shipped. That would not apply to the case where it is going through the State. There is no intention to violate the law of that State and sell it there.

Mr. MAXWELL. But the transportation is illegal, no matter through what State it passes, if any party to the transaction interested therein, directly or indirectly, intends to receive or use it in the State to which it is destined, in violation of the laws of that State. The transaction then is invalid, from the moment it is received by the carrier, even in the State where the contract is made, and it is invalid at every moment subsequent to that time, from that moment passing through any other State.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is with reference to liquors shipped from a certain territory to another specified place.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. It could not be construed to be subject to the effect of this law in any State through which it might pass, because that would not be in the spirit or the commodity intended to be affected by this law.

Mr. MAXWELL. That is very true; but in passing through that State the carrier is engaged in an illegal transaction. In taking it out of the State where it was held the carrier is engaged in an illegal transaction.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not unless he was going to ship it to a specified place.

Mr. MAXWELL. That is true. But if he gets in Ohio the package of liquor which may be lawfully sold there, the contract for which is lawful in that State, but which is intended by any person interested therein, in the State of Georgia, to which it is to be transported, to be received or used there in violation of the law of the State of Georgia, the contract of the carrier in carrying it, and its act of carrying, are made illegal from the moment that the carrier receives the goods in Ohio, during their transportation across the States of Kentucky and Tennessee and Georgia. The carrier from the beginning has been engaged in a transaction which is prohibited by law.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Maxwell, even assuming that to be all true, the practical result, if it was enacted, would be that no prosecutions would be had along the lines which you are now speaking of, would it not? The prosecutions would take place in the vicinities in the States, in the localities, to which the liquor was consigned.

Mr. MAXWELL. They might take place anywhere along the line——

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes——

Mr. MAXWELL. Where the transportation met with the disposition on the part of the officers of a community or particular section of a community to impede the commerce in liquor.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be true; but the person who undertook to bring about this prosecution would have to prove the intent with which the liquor was shipped; and inasmuch as that could only, unless in some exceptional cases, be done by evidence in the locality to which it was consigned, I think that while your construction might be true it would have no practical application for the reason that prosecutions of that kind would be very difficult, in the first place, much more difficult than they would be if they were had in the vicinity where the liquor was delivered to the consignee; so that even if it were true in theory, as a matter of practice it would hardly be done.

Mr. MAXWELL. I suppose, as a matter of practice, the enactment of this law, until its validity was determined by the Supreme Court, would substantially destroy traffic in intoxicating liquors, because the ground upon which the act or transaction is declared to be invalid, and the means for enforcing it, would involve everyone connected with the transaction, although they were acting in good faith.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose that the man who shipped the liquor was acting in good faith, where would he be in any danger?

Mr. MAXWELL. Because the man who received it might transport it to another State where its sale would be entirely legal, and he might nevertheless say, "I intended to violate the laws of this State," so that you would whistle for your money.

Mr. NORRIS. The vendor would probably get his money before he shipped the liquor.

Mr. MAXWELL. Of course the result would be that no commerce could be conducted with safety except by payment in advance of shipment.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. MAXWELL. That would be required for safety not only to the seller but to the carrier, because the carrier has no right of recovery, and all that is necessary for anybody to do under this statute is to say that he intended to violate the laws of the State, and when he says that, that is proved, and immediately the entire transaction becomes from the beginning invalid and illegal. No action can be maintained by the seller against the purchaser. No action can be maintained by the carrier against either seller or purchaser. No contract with respect to any part of the transaction, the sale or transportation, can be enforced in any State of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Taking the case of the carrier, you suggest that the shipper could protect himself from loss by demanding payment in advance?

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the carrier could do the same thing by demanding payment in advance; and if the carrier demanded payment in advance from the shippers of liquor the carrier would have to demand payment in advance, under the interstate commerce act, from all other shippers?

Mr. MAXWELL. He would have to demand payment in advance from all other shippers; otherwise he would be guilty of discrimination, under the interstate commerce act.

Mr. DAVIS. The result would be to put all freight business on a cash basis?

Mr. MAXWELL. On a cash basis, and the result would be to destroy interstate commerce not only in this commodity, which is the object and purpose of those who are promoting this bill, but to destroy interstate commerce in all commodities.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not the only effect be, so far as the seller is concerned, that he would get his money in advance instead of selling on time; and is it not also true that under present conditions, under the present law, all such liquor shipped into States where it is illegally sold is paid for in advance before the shipment is made?

Mr. WEBB. You can not ship it C. O. D. at all now.

Mr. MAXWELL. You can not ship it C. O. D.; no.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. MAXWELL. But you can ship according to the ordinary rules of commerce, with a bill of lading attached, or upon the credit of the consignee. But here you are proposing by an act of Congress to make the entire transaction invalid because of an intent on the part of one of the parties to that transaction uncommunicated to the other.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is right, Mr. Maxwell; but the point I wanted to bring out was that the danger, so far as the shipper was concerned, was practically nil, as I see it, and the danger of liquor being seized in a State through which it must pass to reach its ultimate destination would be practically none, because the evidence of the transaction depending on the intent of some one connected with the transaction, that evidence would necessarily be in the locality where the liquor was finally used illegally, if it was used illegally. That is where you would have to go to get your evidence. That is where prosecutions would occur, if any occurred.

Mr. MAXWELL. But suppose the law of the particular State declared a rule of evidence that possession was prima facie evidence of intention and purpose to use illegally?

Mr. MOON. Suppose it became a question of construction before the Supreme Court of the United States; is it not the cardinal rule that all laws are to be construed according to their possible and not according to their probable effect?

Mr. MAXWELL. That is the rule of construction, and it is doubtless the purpose of this law to invoke that rule of construction for the purpose of embarrassing the transportation of liquor. The extent to which the adoption of this rule would interfere with the trade is not a subject which I propose to discuss. Practical men can tell the committee about that, and whether the liquor could be seized in the State through which it was passing to its destination is not a question which involves the constitutionality of this act, and the suggestions on these subjects are all quite aside from the single objection which I wish to present to this committee, which is that no matter whether its construction be one way or the other upon the various points that are now suggested, this bill is beyond the power of Congress, because it is a delegation by Congress to the State of the regulation of interstate commerce and the regulation of interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect.

In the case of Bowman v. Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Co., reported in 125 U. S., which was decided in 1888, there was involved the question whether the railroad company was liable in damages for refusing, in Illinois, to receive for transportation to Iowa intoxicating liquors. It was lawful in the State of Illinois to sell and transport. It was unlawful in the State of Iowa to sell or transport. The railroad company defended the action on the ground that it was not compelled to receive the liquor, and was not liable in damages for failure to do so, because by the law of Iowa it was forbidden; and the question before the Supreme Court was whether that was a valid defense, and the question was whether the law of Iowa could affect the duty of the railway company, as an interstate carrier, to receive and transport the liquors. Mr. Justice Matthews, in delivering the opinion in that case, said, at page 493:

"Can it be supposed that by omitting any express declarations on the subject, Congress has intended to submit to the several States the decision of the question in each locality of what shall and what shall not be articles of traffic in the interstate commerce of the country? If so, it has left to each State, according to its own caprice and arbitrary will, to discriminate for or against every article grown, produced, manufactured, or sold in any State and sought to be introduced as an article of commerce into any other. If the State of Iowa may prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors from all other States, it may also include tobacco or any other article the use or abuse of which it may deem deleterious. It may not choose even to be governed by considerations growing out of the health, comfort, or peace of the community. Its policy may be directed to other ends. It may choose to establish a system directed to the promotion and benefit of its own agriculture, manufactures, or arts of any description and prevent the introduction and sale within its limits of any or of all articles that it may select as coming into competition with those which it seeks to protect. The police power of the State would extend to such cases, as well as to those in which it was sought to legislate in behalf of the health, peace, and morals of the people. In view of the commercial anarchy and confusion that would result from the diverse exertions of power by the several States of the Union it can not be supposed that the Constitution or Congress have intended to limit the freedom of commercial intercourse among the people of the several States. 'It can not be too strongly insisted upon,' said this court in Wabash, etc., Railway Co. v. Illinois (118 U. S., 557, 572), 'that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it that the commerce clause was intended to secure. This clause giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution.' (Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S., 566, 574; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419, 446.) And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States, which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution if, at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country, the State within whose limits a part of the transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce."

That was said by one of the greatest justices who has sat in the Supreme Court, by a man whose surroundings and associations disconnected him as far as possible from traffic in intoxicating liquors. He was a churchman, an elder in the Presbyterian Church; a man distinguished for his piety as well as for his learning and character. But he sat there as a judge; just as this committee must sit in this case, free from all suggestions that overlook the fundamental limitations upon the power of Congress, which must consider only—not only with respect to this particular commodity, for it is a rule that must apply to all commodities—the provision of the Constitution which places the regulation of interstate commerce in Congress, and exclusively in Congress.

The court did not, in that case, have occasion to determine whether or not the liquor, after being received in the State of destination, might be subject to the local rule with respect to its disposition. Manifestly there is a distinction between the transportation and the disposition of the goods after they have been received by the consignee. The transportation is a national matter and includes the receipt and carriage and delivery to the consignee. After the goods have been delivered and have become a part of the mass of the property of the State, then the State may deal with them, because that becomes a subject of local regulation, and Congress has, by the Wilson bill, expressly authorized the State to deal with subjects of interstate commerce, with intoxicating liquor which has been transported in interstate commerce into a State, after it has been delivered to the consignee and has thereby become a part of the mass of the property of the State.

Mr. WEBB. You would have argued that law unconstitutional, too, would you not, Mr. Maxwell? Would you not have argued that that was unconstitutional—any attempt to take away from the consignee the right not only to receive it but to sell it?

Mr. MAXWELL. The validity of that law was, of course, argued before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of In re Rahrer.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MAXWELL. Which was the first case in the Supreme Court involving the construction and validity of that act, and there the Supreme Court held that the power to sell after the goods had been delivered to the consignee and had become a part of the mass of the property in the State was not an essential incident of interstate commerce.

Mr. WEBB. But it had been held an essential incident in other cases, had it not?

Mr. MAXWELL. It had been.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MAXWELL. But the Supreme Court of the United States declared in that case that the right of the consignee to sell in the original package was not an essential incident of interstate commerce. When the case of Rhodes v. Iowa came up, which is reported in 170 U. S., page 412, the question was whether under the Wilson Act it was competent for the State, in the exercise of its power, to deal with the property or impose its regulations, the particular State regulation there involved comprehending the seizure prior to the delivery of the property to the consignee, and the Supreme Court of the United States decided, without passing upon the constitutional question, that under the Wilson Act the power of the State could not be exerted until the essentially interstate-commerce transaction was ended; in other words, until the commodity had been delivered to the consignee.

Mr. WEBB. Did they not say in that same case that, if Congress chose to do so, it might subject these intoxicating liquors to the police power of the State at an earlier period?

Mr. MAXWELL. No; they did not say that; the case was decided upon a construction of the Wilson Act, which was necessary in order to make that statute constitutional. That is obvious. I have the case before me. Mr. Justice White, now the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, said, at page 424:

"Whilst it is true that the right to sell free from State interference interstate-commerce merchandise was held in Leisy v. Hardin to be an essential incident to interstate commerce, it was yet but an incident, as the contract of sale within a State in its nature was usually subject to the control of the legislative authority of the State. On the other hand, the right to contract for the transportation of merchandise from one State into or across another involved interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect, and imported in its very essence a relation which necessarily must be governed by laws apart from the laws of the several States, since it embraced a contract which must come under the laws of more than one State. The purpose of Congress to submit the incidental power to sell to the dominion of State authority should not without the clearest implication be held to imply the purpose of subjecting to State laws a contract which in its very object and nature was not susceptible of such regulation even if the constitutional right to do so existed, as to which no opinion is expressed."

Mr. MOON. In other words, he complimented Congress in construing that act by saying that they would not attempt to do so ridiculous a thing as to assert the right of the State to interfere with interstate commerce. They would not construe it that Congress meant that, because they gave Congress the credit of not attempting to commit an absurdity; was that it?

Mr. MAXWELL. That is it. They construed that act so that it should be constitutional; and out of deference of the judicial department to the legislative department they said they would not assume that Congress undertook to regulate a transaction which, in its very nature, was not susceptible of regulation in that way.

Mr. WEBB. They complimented Congress, not for refusing to prohibit the shipment of all whisky in interstate commerce, but simply because they did not delegate this interstate-commerce power to the States. There is no compliment on the whisky side of it.

Mr. MAXWELL. Oh no.

Mr. WEBB. I understood you that the compliment was because they did not exclude all whisky.

Mr. MOON. They said that Congress did not mean to interfere with its interstate shipment. When you come to read the language of the act, I am not so sure about it, and never was; but the court simply said that Congress could not do that. They knew that would be contrary to the Constitution, and they said, "We know that you would not attempt to do so ridiculous a thing." That is about what the court said.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

Mr. MOON. You read the language of the Wilson Act, and I think you will come to the conclusion that Congress did intend to surrender that to the police power of the State.

Mr. WEBB. Then there is no compliment to Congress.

Mr. MOON. They dug that out of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAXWELL. The Supreme Court of the United States did in that case what it is the duty of every court to do—to construe the act, if possible, so that it will be constitutional; and so construing it they took occasion to point out that they could not impute to Congress the intention to leave to the various States a rule which, in respect of interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect, could only be prescribed by a national body.

What is the purpose of this bill? The sole purpose of this bill is to put into the power of the State the authority to interfere with an interstate-commerce transaction in its fundamental aspect by seizing the liquor before the interstate-commerce transaction is ended, to wit, before delivery to the consignee.

Mr. CARLIN. Have you before you the criminal code? I have on my notes a reference to sections 242, 249, and 255.

Mr. MAXWELL. I have here section 242; that is the game law.

Mr. CARLIN. What is section 249?

Mr. MAXWELL. That is with reference to equipping vessels for the slave trade.

Mr. CARLIN. Section 255 has been cited here as bearing on this situation.

Mr. MAXWELL. That has nothing to do with interstate commerce. That was cited, as I understand it, on the subject of intent. Congress prohibited the equipment of vessels in the slave trade, and, being a criminal statute, made it one of the conditions of the criminal act that it should be done with intent to accomplish the criminal purpose.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am very much obliged to you for the time which you have given me, which I have already transgressed.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose you intend to revise your remarks, and the committee regrets that it can not give you more time to-day; so that, if you desire it, you may submit to the committee a brief, which will be printed as a part of the hearings.

Mr. MAXWELL. I shall be glad to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. And in that brief I am sure the committee would be very glad to have you review all the decisions in these cases. You started to do that in your argument. You took the case of Bowman v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co., and then you started to review the history of the Wilson law, the act of August 8, 1890.

Mr. MAXWELL. That was passed as the result of the decision in the case of Leisy v. Hardin.

The CHAIRMAN. The case of Leisy v. Hardin was decided April 28, 1890.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Following that, the Rhodes case came. We would like for you to review that, and the Rahrer case, and then the case of Vance v. Vandercook, the South Carolina case.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an expression used in that latter case on which we would like to have your views. I believe I can give you what it is. It refers to the personal use. Mr. Justice White, in the case of Vance v. Vandercook, used this language, and I quote from one hundred and seventieth United States, page 452. They first say the distinction between the right to transport intoxicating liquors into the States for personal use and the legal restriction imposed by the State on liquors for sale or storage is clearly shown. The statute of South Carolina involving the question of personal consumption was considered, and the right was upheld. It appears to have been upheld. Mr. Justice White, on behalf of the court, said:

"Indeed, the law of the State here under review does not purport to forbid the shipment into the State from other States of intoxicating liquors for the use of a resident, and if it did so, it would upon principle and under the ruling in Scott v. Donald, to that extent be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. It is argued that the foregoing considerations are inapplicable, since the State law now before us, whilst it recognizes the right of residents of other States to ship liquor into South Carolina for the use of residents therein, attaches to the exercise of that right such restrictions as virtually destroy it.

"But the right of persons in one State to ship liquor into another State to a resident for his own use is derived from the Constitution of the United States, and does not rest on the grant of the State law. Either the conditions attached by the State law unlawfully restrain the right or they do not. If they do—and we shall hereafter examine this contention—then they are void. If they do not, then there is no lawful ground of complaint on the subject."

Then, further along, he says:

"Conceding, without deciding, the power of the State where it has placed the control of the sale of all liquor with the State in charge of its own officers to provide for an inspection of liquors shipped into a State by residents of other States for use by residents within the State, it is clear that such a law, to be valid, must not substantially hamper or burden the constitutional right on the one hand to make, and on the other to receive, such shipment."

I call your attention to that, and to the other cases I have referred to; and also, Mr. Maxwell, we would like to have you get hold of several reports that have gone from this committee, dealing with this question. You will find that a report was made from this committee on April 8, 1904, reviewing the Wilson law, and reporting a bill to do away, as far as Congress could do so, with the effect of the decisions which militated against the effectiveness of the Wilson law.

Then you will find, again, that on January 24, 1907, Mr. Littlefield reported on behalf of this committee a bill to the House on this subject, somewhat after the form of the Wilson law, and he undertook in that report to review all these decisions; and I want to say for the members of the committee that most of us who have been on the committee for a long time have heard all of these decisions reviewed quite frequently before, but we would like for you to review them in connection with this particular bill.

Mr. MAXWELL. That I shall be glad to do. In my argument I intended to say something about many of them, but I have exhausted the time allotted to me. I speak with diffidence before this committee, whose familiarity with the subject is much more intimate than mine. I suppose that I was asked to speak here because I have had occasion to argue some cases in the Supreme Court of the United States involving the application of State laws to interstate commerce, including the cases that came up from Iowa and some that came up from Kentucky.

The purpose of this law, the effect of it, is nowhere more aptly stated than it was in the proceedings before this committee on January 30, where Mr. Dinwiddie said:

"The beauty about this law, as Mr. WEBB expressed it to me the other day, is that it expands or contracts with the legislation of the State."

That is the whole of this law. That is the beauty of it; that is the purpose of it—to have regulation if the State imposes it, to have regulation to the extent that the State imposes it, to have regulation stop when the State says so.

The CHAIRMAN. You think that beauty is, then, fatal to its constitutionality?

Mr. MAXWELL. That beauty, which is the object of attraction to its advocates, is the beauty which makes it unconstitutional. It is the beauty which removes the regulation as a regulation of commerce and commits it to the States. It expands or contracts, not as Congress determines in its wisdom, but as the States determine, for any of the many purposes which, as Mr. Justice Mathews pointed out, would be included in the exercise of their police power.

I had also proposed to say something on the subject of the invalidity of this bill on the ground that it denies fundamental rights by destroying the validity of a contract because of the intent of one of the parties not communicated to the other, and to call the attention of the committee to the observation of Mr. Justice Holmes in one of the cases before the Supreme Court, where he said that commerce among the States is a practical conception. To make the intent of the consignee the test of interstate commerce is even a more visionary contention than one drawn from the witty diversities of the law of sales.

Chief Justice Brian, in an early case, as quoted by Lord Blackburn in a later case in the House of Lords, said: "It is trite law that the thought of man is not triable, for even the devil does not know what the thought of man is."

Under this section a contract made by one of the parties in good faith immediately becomes invalid because of the uncommunicated and unknown intent of the other party.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like for you to discuss that more elaborately in your brief than you have had the opportunity of discussing it here. Of course Congress has regulated to an extent that practically amounts to the prohibition of the transportation of diseased cattle in interstate commerce, but there the diseased nature of the cattle was an inherent characteristic of the property entering into interstate commerce. So, also, has it regulated the matter of the shipment of explosives; but there the dangerous nature of the explosives was an inherent characteristic of the commodity. Here the idea is that the purpose for which the consignee intends to use the liquor shall relate back to the initial transaction of the shipment and affect that. I would like to hear from you on that in your brief.

Mr. MAXWELL. I shall be glad to treat that. We submit that that feature of the law is absolutely repugnant to fundamental principles underlying all law and to the Constitution of the United States.

With respect to the shipment of putrescent food and articles which of themselves would be a danger to interstate commerce, such as explosives, I shall have printed in my brief what the court in the case of In re Rahrer refers to as the sagacious observations of Mr. Justice Catron in the license cases, where he points out the difference between forbidding the shipment of such articles in interstate commerce and the regulation of interstate commerce by the State, upon the ground that those articles are not subjects of interstate commerce at all, and may be so declared, and are so declared by the act of Congress.

Mr. WEBB. On that line, let me suggest these laws to you, to show you that Congress has never followed out any such line as that. In the Dingley law they prohibited absolutely the importation of any goods or merchandise made in whole or in part by convict labor. There the goods were just as fine and as wholesome and as sanitary as any other goods. A little later they passed a law prohibiting the shipment or transportation in any vessel of any loose hay. Loose hay is just as good as any other hay. Congress gets the power to do these things from the constitutional provision giving it control over interstate commerce. A little later, for the benefit of a few New York manufacturers of silver and gold, they prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of gold and silver with three words on it, "U. S. Assay," and if it did not bear the correct amount of gold and silver in it. There was nothing hurtful about the gold and silver; there was nothing hurtful about it if it had the "U. S. Assay" on it; but Congress absolutely prohibited in commerce those things. Congress further prohibits, if you will notice, the transporting in interstate commerce of meats, whether diseased or not, unless they are inspected by an inspector. That meat may be perfectly wholesome, but unless it has the stamp of the inspector upon it, it can not be shipped in interstate commerce, and although the cattle were just as healthy as any in the world and the meat is perfectly sound, it is condemned; and that is not confiscation.

Mr. CARLIN. But the right to prohibit is not involved, under your argument.

Mr. MAXWELL. Not at all.

Mr. CARLIN. The question here is whether Congress does anything else than delegate the power to some one else to prohibit.

Mr. MAXWELL. And nothing is more pertinent, in that connection, than the sagacious observations of Mr. Justice Catron quoted by Chief Justice Fuller in In re Rahrer, the case in which the Wilson Act was held to be constitutional:

"The exclusive State power is made to rest, not on the fact of the state or condition of the article, nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the State laws, and asserted as the State policy, that it shall be excluded from commerce. And by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created, in a case where it did not previously exist. If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation; for it takes from Congress, and leaves with the States, the power to determine the commodities, or articles of property, which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated. Upon this theory, the power to regulate commerce, instead of being paramount over the subject, would become subordinate to the State policy power; for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subjects of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation, is, in effect, the controlling one."

And so it is here. Congress is not asked by this bill to declare a national policy or to prescribe a uniform regulation, but to provide that whatever the different States from time to time declare by varying rules not to be the subject of interstate commerce shall not be carried in interstate commerce.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Maxwell, I think you said you wanted to be heard.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not think the bill before the committee involves consideration of the question of the general power of Congress to prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquor in interstate commerce, because any such provision would necessarily involve a complete revolution in the great body of the laws of the United States and in its fiscal system. I understand that the total revenue of the Federal Government for the fiscal year 1910, raised by taxation, amounted to $675,000,000, and that of that revenue $252,000,000 was derived from the tax on intoxicating liquor. So that if the transportation of these liquors in interstate commerce is to be considered by Congress, it must be in connection with an entire change of policy as to the fiscal affairs of the Government and its taxation.

Mr. NORRIS. Could I ask you a question there? Can you give us any information as to how much of that tax is derived from the intoxicating liquors used illegally or sold illegally?

Mr. MAXWELL. How can you ascertain that?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I do not know; I was trying to get information from you.

Mr. MAXWELL. That could not be ascertained. You might ascertain what liquor was transported into the States that have regulating laws, but how much of that, if any, was used illegally or transported for the purpose of being used illegally, of course, could not be ascertained. I am told that in the Internal Revenue Department the greatest violation of the internal-revenue laws with respect to the manufacture of distilled spirits occurs in the States where prohibitory laws are in force, and those statistics the committee can easily get from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I understand that the work of the Department of Justice in punishing violations of the internal-revenue laws is largely in States where the traffic in intoxicating liquor is wholly prohibited.

Mr. NORRIS. This law would not apply to this, as I understand it. That would not be interstate commerce.

Mr. MAXWELL. That would not be interstate commerce; no.

On the question of the general and absolute prohibition of transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce you would have to consider whether Congress, under the power given to it by the Constitution to regulate, could prohibit the transportation of an article which by the commercial usages of the world and the laws of the United States is an article of commerce. You would also with respect to the particular method of prohibition suggested by this bill have to consider some fundamental principles established by the Constitution of the United States. For instance, in the case of Adair v. United States (208 U. S., 162), the court held that Congress had no power to make it a criminal offense against the United States for a carrier engaged in interstate commerce to discharge an employee simply because of membership in a labor organization, and that a provision to that effect in an act of Congress concerning interstate commerce was a violation of personal liberty as well as of the right of property created by the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That was an act passed under the authority of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and the Supreme Court struck down that provision because the power of Congress was limited in respect to regulation of interstate commerce by other fundamental provisions in the Constitution of the United States.

Take another case, the case United States v. Fox (95 U. S., 670). The court decided that section 5132 of the Revised Statutes, which declares that every person respecting whom proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced, who, within three months before their commencement obtains goods upon false pretenses with intent to defraud, shall be punished by imprisonment, was inoperative to render the act an offense because its criminal character was to be determined by a subsequent proceeding. The act was criminal if within three months there should be proceedings in bankruptcy. It was not criminal if the proceedings were commenced in three months and a day. The Supreme Court held it was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Why? Justice Field, in the course of his opinion, did not refer to any specific provision of the Constitution, but decided that an act which is not an offense at the time it is committed can not become such by any subsequent independent act of the party with which it has no connection. The criminal intent must exist when the act complained of is done; it can not be imputed from a subsequent independent transaction. And there are other decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and in State courts suggesting the same principle.

Mr. MOON. Take a simple illustration. Suppose we passed a law requiring railroads to carry everybody at a rate of 1 cent a mile. That is regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Where anything of that kind has been attempted it has been at once said that it is confiscatory. Therefore the powers of Congress are subject to all the other limitations placed in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MAXWELL. They must be; that has been decided frequently by the Supreme Court.

Now, with respect to this particular bill. It says that the transaction is prohibited and the contract is declared to be void if one of the parties, unknown to the other, intends to violate any law of a State. That is an attempt to declare a transaction invalid because one of the parties to the transaction, unknown to the other, intends to violate in the future, when he gets the goods, some law of the State. Suppose he does have that intent in his mind when the goods are ordered. Suppose he abandons that intention before the goods are delivered to the carrier, or after they are delivered to the carrier and before they are delivered to him. Nevertheless, that intent which he had at the time he purchased the goods, and at any time before the goods are delivered to him, renders the whole transaction invalid.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Maxwell, if you agree that Congress could prohibit entirely that shipment without assigning cause, don't you admit that it could limit it?

Mr. MAXWELL. Certainly, Congress could not do that. But by this bill Congress is asked to say that a transaction is invalid if one of the parties to that transaction has the intent at any time, undisclosed to the other, to violate some law of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Maxwell, if this bill were changed so that the intent were confined to one person, would it in your judgment change the status of the thing?

Mr. MAXWELL. No; it would not. The right of transportation in interstate commerce is a right of the consignor, of the vendor, as well as the consignee, and that right can not be affected so as to render the contract invalid as against the seller because of the undisclosed purpose or intent of the buyer to violate the law.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I wanted to make is this: In your argument you have repeatedly said that this law would apply if the intent of any of the persons was to use it illegally, that intent being unknown to any of the other persons. Then your judgment would be that the law would be just as bad if the intent were confined entirely to one person in the transportation.

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes; and for what reason? You can not have an interstate transaction without the cooperation of two or more, and it is not within the power of Congress or any legislature under a constitutional government to declare a contract, which requires the cooperation of two or more persons, invalid because one of those persons has the intent to commit a crime.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. Do you concede that Congress has the constitutional power to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors altogether?

Mr. MAXWELL. I do not; I do not concede that power.

Mr. MOON. Do you concede the second proposition, that even supposing they had, it gives them the right to discriminate?

Mr. MAXWELL. Not at all.

Mr. MOON. They have a right to say that diseased cattle shall not go into interstate commerce, and thereby absolutely outlaw them, but they have not a right—if they do not outlaw—to discriminate between the different States as to the shipment.

Mr. MAXWELL. They have not; no sir. That means, to use the language of Mr. Justice Matthews in the case of Bowman v. Railway Company, commercial anarchy. The very purpose of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution was to prevent commercial anarchy and to have interstate commerce subject, and subject only, to uniform rules established by the Congress of the United States, so that when any man in a foreign country or in this country wishes to engage in interstate commerce the only law that he has to consult is the law of the United States. On the other hand, under this bill no man in London, Paris, or New York, or Philadelphia could engage in interstate commerce in this commodity without consulting the law of the State to which the goods are to go. He can not find out whether an interstate transaction is regulated, or to what extent, by making an exhaustive search of the laws of the United States. He would not get a start there, because immediately he would be referred to the various laws of the States. That is just what the commerce clause was intended to prevent. Under the commerce clause a man who wants to engage in interstate commerce or foreign commerce is required to consult, and to consult only, the laws of the United States.

Mr. CARLIN. A great deal of stress has been laid on the fact that Congress has recognized in the way of statutes the shipment of birds. What have you to say about that?

Mr. MAXWELL. I am very glad to have an opportunity to say a word about that. What I have said just now about the prohibition of interstate traffic or the power of Congress to absolutely prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce is, in my opinion, quite aside from the question that you have before you in this bill. The fundamental objection to this bill, the objection which is vital and can not be overcome, is the objection that this bill undertakes to delegate to the States whatever regulation of interstate commerce is to be accomplished by the bill, and, as the chairman of the subcommittee so clearly pointed out, this law itself discloses no regulation; it has no vitality except as State laws come in. The power to regulate is the power to prescribe the rules under which interstate commerce shall be conducted, and there are no rules in this bill. The rules exist only when the State acts and to the extent that the State acts, and when the State repeals the law there is no rule, and when the State amends the law the rule is modified.

Now, it is said, "Does that delegate the power to the State?" There is no magic in the word "delegate." The objection is that Congress undertakes to regulate commerce among the States, not by any rule which it prescribes, but by a rule which it leaves the States to prescribe.

Has Congress any policy—because the regulation of interstate commerce must evidence some public policy—has Congress any policy about the transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce? None whatever by this bill. Whatever is the policy of any particular State is the policy adopted by this bill. Congress has no policy. Congress by this law leaves the regulation, whatever it is, the expression of public policy, entirely to the State and dependent upon the State.

In that connection, if the committee will allow me, I would like to quote a passage from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden. On page 206 he says:

"The act of 1803 (3 U. S. L., 529) prohibiting the importation of slaves into any State which shall itself prohibit their importation implies, it is said, an admission that the States possessed the power to exclude or admit them; from which it is inferred that they possess the same power with respect to other articles.

"If this inference were correct; if this power was exercised, not under any particular clause in the Constitution, but in virtue of a general right over the subject of commerce, to exist as long as the Constitution itself, it might now be exercised. Any State might now import African slaves into its own territory. But it is obvious that the power of the States over this subject previous to the year 1808 constitutes an exception to the power of Congress to regulate commerce, and the exception is expressed in such words as to manifest clearly the intention to continue the preexisting right of the States to admit or exclude for a limited period. The words are: "The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808." The whole object of the exception is to preserve the power to those States which might be disposed to exercise it; and its language seems to the court to convey this idea unequivocally. The possession of this particular power, then, during the time limited in the Constitution can not be admitted to prove the possession of any other similar power."

Now, Mr. Caldwell could not, of course, fail to appreciate the vital importance of the objection which we urge to this bill; and, so far as possible, I have refrained from discussing any other objection. What is the good of considering other objections to a bill which is clearly repugnant to the Constitution of the United States because it delegates to the States a power which rests exclusively in Congress? And Mr. Caldwell, fine lawyer as he is, thoroughly appreciative of the significance of that objection, argued here for two hours without ever touching the point, and then, when his attention was called late in the afternoon to that objection, he referred to the Lottery case. But the act of Congress involved in that case did not leave anything to the States. It prohibited absolutely the interstate transportation of lottery tickets. It delegated no power to the States and was not dependent on any State law.

Another illustration used by Mr. Caldwell was that of obscene books, being section 245 of the criminal code of the United States. Congress does not say they are prohibited between States which provide that obscene books and pictures shall not be received. Congress declares its own rule, and says that obscene books shall not be transported in the mails or carried in interstate commerce. There is no delegation of power to the States.

Then, with respect to the adoption or enactment of criminal laws of the States, in territory within the States subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, being section 289 of the criminal code, Congress left nothing to the States. Congress said that the laws in existence were enacted by it and that they should remain in force, so far as the United States are concerned, notwithstanding any subsequent repeal or amendment thereof by the State. There was no delegation of power to the State.

Then they cite the Lacey Act of 1900, now section 242 of the criminal code, which makes it unlawful to transport in interstate commerce the dead bodies of wild animals or birds killed in violation of the law of the State in which they were killed or from which they were shipped, and Mr. Caldwell says that statute is an instance of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, dependent upon action by the State. What Congress did by that statute was to make it illegal to transport in interstate commerce certain animals, or the dead bodies of certain animals, which are by the common law feræ naturæ, which belong to the sovereign, and which can not become private property or an article of commerce except with the sovereign's consent. Whether wild animals and birds are property depends entirely upon the law of the State in which they are killed. There is no other law that can govern the subject. What Congress did was to say that, since wild animals and birds killed in violation of law are not articles of commerce, they shall not be transported in interstate commerce. They are not property at all.

The statute has been before the courts in two cases. In United States v. Smith (115 Fed., 423), which was an indictment under the statute before Archbald, in the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania in 1902, he sustained a demurrer to the indictment on the ground that it did not state an offense.

Mr. WEBB. In that it failed to set up the State law.

Mr. MAXWELL. The indictment was not sustained because it was not a good indictment. Here is what he said in his opinion, at page 428, in answer to the argument that the statute was unconstitutional:

"According to the views so expressed, I am therefor clearly of the opinion that no evasion or violation of the act is disclosed in the indictment, and that the demurrer must be sustained. The larger question whether the act is a legitimate exercise of the power given to Congress by the Constitution to legislate with regard to interstate commerce, or is merely, as charged, a national game law, thinly disguised, which it had no authority to pass, although fully discussed at the argument, I do not feel called upon to decide. Neither do I the further question whether—assuming the act to be valid—dead game carried in the hands, or as part of the personal luggage of the party who has killed it, must be regarded as falling within the terms of the act when transported under such conditions from State to State."

Mr. CARLIN. Did he hold that the dead game was property?

Mr. MAXWELL. He did not. United States v. Thompson (147 Fed., 637) is the other case in which the statute has been before the courts. A demurrer to the indictment was sustained in that case. The question of the validity of the statute was not discussed or passed upon.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Maxwell, may I make this suggestion: Have you read the report of the Interstate and Foreign Committee that reported this game-law bill?

Mr. MAXWELL. I have not.

Mr. WEBB. It was written by Mr. Sherman, who is now Vice President, and I wish to say that the reason for passing the law suggested by you was never even hinted at by the gentleman who made the report. I have never heard it asserted in this country that if a man takes wild game in his own possession it is not property. I am quite sure you will find Congress did not undertake to exercise its power based on that supposition.

Mr. MAXWELL. That is not a supposition; that is as old and as certain as any principle of law can be that the power to appropriate animals which are feræ naturæ as private property depends wholly upon the consent of the sovereign. They are the property of the sovereign and no man can acquire a right of private property in them except with the consent of the sovereign. Who is the sovereign? The sovereign is the State in which the animals are. Therefore, when the State has prohibited the killing or reduction to possession of those animals by killing, it says there can be no private property in them. That is as old as English law, and all that Congress has done, therefore, is to say that an article which is not the subject of private property and which is therefore not essentially an article of commerce shall not be transported.

The point is settled by the case of Geer v. State of Connecticut (161 U. S., 519). A statute of Connecticut, while providing an open season for the killing of birds, made it an offense to have the birds in possession with intention to procure their transportation beyond the limits of the State. The offense with which Geer was charged was the possession of game birds for the purpose of transporting them beyond the State, although they had been lawfully killed within the State. The Supreme Court of Connecticut sustained the conviction, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States upon the claim that the Connecticut statute was repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. In stating the case, Mr. Justice White said that the sole question was whether the State of Connecticut had "the power to regulate the killing of game within her borders so as to confine its use to the limits of the State and forbid its transmission outside of the State" (161 U. S., 522).

He said (p. 522):

"The solution of the question involves a consideration of the nature of the property in game and the authority which the State had a right lawfully to exercise in relation thereto. From the earliest traditions the right to reduce animals feræ naturæ to possession has been subject to the control of the law-giving power."

The learned Justice then examines the law of Greece, Rome, France, Germany, and England. At page 527 he says:

"The practice of the Government of England from the earliest time to the present has put into execution the authority to control and regulate the taking of game."

This authority, he says, passed to the Colonies, and then to the States. Citing many American cases, he says, at page 528:

"The adjudicated cases recognizing the right of the State to control and regulate the common property in game are numerous."

At page 529 he says:

"The common ownership, and its resulting responsibility in the State are thus stated in a well-considered opinion of the Supreme Court of California: 'The wild game within a State belongs to the people in their collective sovereign capacity. It is not the subject of private ownership, except in so far as the people may elect to make it so; and they may, if they see fit, absolutely prohibit the taking of it or any traffic and commerce in it if deemed necessary for its protection or preservation or the public good.'"

At page 530 he says:

"In view of the authority of the State to affix conditions to the killing and sale of game, predicated as is this power on the peculiar nature of such property and its common ownership by all the citizens of the State, it may well be doubted whether commerce is created by an authority given by a State to reduce game within its borders to possession, provided such game be not taken, when killed, without the jurisdiction of the State. The common ownership imports the right to keep the property, if the sovereign so chooses, always within its jurisdiction for every purpose. The qualification which forbids its removal from the State necessarily entered into and formed part of every transaction on the subject, and deprived the mere sale or exchange of these articles of that element of freedom of contract and of full ownership which is an essential attribute of commerce."

At page 532 he says:

"The power of the State to control the killing of and ownership in game being admitted, the commerce in game, which the State law permitted, was necessarily only internal commerce since the restriction that it should not become the subject of external commerce went along with the grant and was a part of it. All ownership in game killed within the State came under this condition, which the State had the lawful authority to impose, and no contracts made in relation to such property were exempt from the law of the State consenting that such contracts be made, provided only they were confined to internal and did not extend to external commerce."

Mr. NORRIS. In that case you would have to look to something besides the Federal statute to see——

Mr. MAXWELL. To see what? To see whether the article offered for transportation is in fact an article of commerce, and that can be determined only by the law of the State, which has the sole right to say whether its wild animals and birds may be appropriated as private property.

Mr. NORRIS. You would have to look to the State statute in order to see whether your Federal law applied.

Mr. MAXWELL. You would have to look to the State statute to see whether it was an article of commerce at all; in other words, whether it was property.

Mr. WEBB. And whether the Federal statute had been violated.

Mr. MAXWELL. No; not whether it had been violated, but whether the thing offered for transportation is in fact an object of commerce by the law of the State, which is the only law that can make it an article of commerce. But when you deal with spirits, wine, ale, and beer, which are recognized by the commercial usages of the world as articles of commerce, you do not have to go to any State law to see whether they are in fact articles of commerce.

Mr. WEBB. But in the open season the Federal Congress makes these birds an article of commerce and permits their transportation, because the various States which have these State laws permit the killing of them and their transportation.

Mr. MAXWELL. Congress does not make them articles of commerce at all.

Mr. CARLIN. The birds do not seem to have had friends enough to raise the question. That has never been passed upon?

Mr. MAXWELL. The constitutionality of the statute has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court. But why should we get involved in a discussion as to the constitutionality of the Lacey law. The question before the committee is whether the Webb bill is constitutional. The two are not the same or similar. One relates to wild animals and birds over which the States have exclusive control; the other to spirits, wine, ale, and beer, which "are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce," to use the words of the Supreme Court in its latest decision announced only a month or so ago in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. F. W. Cook Brewing Co.

Mr. WEBB. Let me suggest this: You are aware, of course, that the Supreme Court of the United States has said that no citizen of the United States or any State has any inherent right to manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors. In that particular case liquor stands almost alone. You could not say that as to raising wheat and corn. The United States Government has put whisky on a different basis, and we contend that no man has a right to make it or sell it, but there is no power in Congress to limit its transportation.

Mr. MAXWELL. The State, in the exercise of its police power, may say that intoxicating liquors shall not be manufactured, that they shall not be possessed, perhaps that they shall not be used by the individual for his personal use, and that they shall not be subject to bargain and sale. Now, that is essentially a State matter, a local matter, upon which the power of the State is ample and complete. There is no law of the United States that interferes in the slightest degree with the full exertion of the police power of the State in respect to the use of or traffic in intoxicating liquors within the State. Now, what is the purpose of this bill? Is it to enlarge the police powers of the State? Of course, if it is, it is invalid. Is it to assist the State in the enforcement of its police power?

Mr. WEBB. Right there I want to ask you this question: There is a period of time between the arrival of a consignment of whisky in the express office and its delivery during which the State can not take any action with reference to it. In other words, a package of whisky that arrives in a town, say, to-day may remain in that express office or depot two days, three days, or a week, and the State has not power to touch it until it is delivered to the consignee.

Mr. MAXWELL. Until it is delivered to the consignee, or until the carrier holds it as warehouseman for the consignee.

Mr. WEBB. He has got to hold it a reasonable time. Now, can you suggest—I realize you are a great lawyer—can you suggest any way by which the State might have some right with reference to that whisky if it is shown it is intended to be used in violation of its laws where it rests within her territory and within her jurisdiction?

Mr. MAXWELL. Not prior to the delivery to the consignee, so long as the Constitution of the United States and the commerce clause of the Constitution stand and are enforced.

Mr. WEBB. Congress can not enforce it?

Mr. MAXWELL. Congress can not——

Mr. WEBB. Then there is no sovereign power anywhere to control liquor?

Mr. MAXWELL. What you were asking was with respect to the power of the State. I do not mean to say that the Federal Congress has no power.

Mr. WEBB. You say the Federal Congress can not prohibit the interstate shipment of whisky——

Mr. MAXWELL. My opinion is—but that question is not involved here, and I would prefer to be excused from discussing it, because I have come to discuss a particular bill and an objection that is fundamental under the Constitution. But I do say that no State, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, can exercise any police power over an interstate shipment prior to its delivery to the consignee. The delivery to the consignee may be by delivering it to the person or to his agent, or it may be by retaining it for him in a warehouse. The fundamental objection is that consistently with the Constitution of the United States no such police power can be exerted by the State, even with the consent of Congress. That is reenforced in such clear and explicit terms by Mr. Justice Lurton in the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. F. W. Cook Brewing Co., in an opinion rendered January 22, 1912, that I would like the permission of the chairman or Mr. WEBB to read what he says on that subject. A member of the committee has suggested that this decision does not add anything to prior decisions. That may be true, but it states clearly the principles which had been established by the decisions:

"By a long line of decisions, beginning even prior to Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), it has been indisputably determined:

"(a) That beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce.

"(b) That it is not competent for any State to forbid any common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.

"(c) That until such transportation is concluded by delivery to the consignee, such commodities do not become subject to State regulation restraining their sale or disposition.

"The Wilson Act, which subjects such liquors to State regulation, although still in the original packages, does not apply before actual delivery to such consignee where the shipment is interstate. Some of the many later cases in which these matters have been so determined and the Wilson Act construed are: Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412); Vance v. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438); Heyman v. Southern Railway (203 U. S., 270); Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky (214 U. S., 218).

"Valid as the Kentucky legislation undoubtedly was as a regulation in respect to intrastate shipments of such articles, it was most obviously never an effective enactment in so far as it undertook to regulate interstate shipments to dry points. Pending this very litigation, the Kentucky Court of Appeals, upon the authority of the line of cases above cited, reached the same conclusion. (C. & N. O. Ry. v. Kentucky, 126 Ky., 563.)

"The obligation of the railroad company to conform to the requirements of the Kentucky law, so far as that law prohibited intrastate shipments, is clear, and to this extent its circular notification was commendable. But the duty of this company as an interstate common carrier for hire, to receive for transportation to consignees upon its line in Kentucky from consignors in other States any commodity which is an ordinary subject of interstate commerce, and such transportation could not be prohibited by any law of the State of such consignee, inasmuch as any such law would be an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce not authorized by the police power of the State."

Mr. WEBB. I think we all agree that that is the law.

Mr. MAXWELL. What is sought to be accomplished by this bill? Are you trying to enlarge the police power of the States? That you can not do. Are you trying to have that police power exerted before the interstate transaction in its fundamental aspect is completed? That you can not do. You are trying to do nothing that is within the power of Congress. Absolutely nothing.

Now, if the committee please, the suggestion is made that if this bill is of doubtful constitutionality put it up to the Supreme Court.

Mr. WEBB. I want to say that I have made no such suggestion.

Mr. MAXWELL. I know you have not, and I do not believe you would concur in that. I am a lawyer and nothing else. I want the courts preserved for the administration of justice. It is essential under our system of government that the Supreme Court of the United States should be vested with authority to pass upon the constitutionality of statutes, but it is desirable that that jurisdiction should be invoked as little as possible. The common cry when the court declares an act unconstitutional is that it is usurping the functions of the legislature. The pity is that that cry is used to impair the influence and usefulness of the courts for the primary purpose for which they are formed, to wit, the administration of justice between man and man. Therefore I deplore the presentation of constitutional cases to the court unnecessarily, and I am sure this committee, recognizing the duty resting upon it to maintain and preserve the Constitution, would hesitate to recommend a bill of doubtful validity with the idea of putting it up to the Supreme Court. That is something Congress should carefully refrain from doing, and therefore it is, if the committee please, that I have come here to offer the objections which seem to me to be fatal to this bill. What I have said is just what I would say if the bill were for argument before the Supreme Court of the United States in a case involving its constitutionality.

Senator Knox, in stating his views relative to the constitutionality of bills to regulate interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors, which were before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and reported upon adversely by it in 1909, said (S. Doc. No. 146, p. 9, 61st Cong., 1st sess.):

"My conclusions are:

"First. Interstate shipments are not completed until they reach the consignee.

"Second. An interruption or interference with interstate shipments before they reach the consignee constitutes a regulation of commerce.

"Third. Regulating interstate shipments is an exclusive function of Congress.

"Fourth. Congress can not delegate any part of its exclusive power the States.

"Fifth. To remove the bar or impediment of exclusive Federal power which shuts the States out of the Federal domain and thereby allows them to enter that domain is to permit or sanction a State law in violation of the Constitution and in effect to delegate a Federal function to the States.

"For these and other reasons assigned I am constrained to vote against the bills we have been considering."

STATE RIGHTS.

It is a pity that we do not hear more of State obligations. There is no right without a correlative obligation. No State has the right to ask for a Federal statute of more than doubtful constitutionality unless it has rigidly enforced its own laws in relation to the matter in regard to which it seeks legislation.

The proponents of this bill have utterly failed in substantially every instance to show anything approaching a proper enforcement of the laws of the different States referred to in the hearings.

Dr. Berry, superintendent of the Maine Civic League, said:

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, our laws in Maine forbid the transportation of alcoholic beverages intended for illegal purposes, and make them seizable at any point. Our laws make it a crime for any person or corporation to transport them, but the interpretation that is put upon the interstate-commerce law makes those laws inoperative. Our troubles are due to outside influences. The only liquors that come to Maine are those that are forced into Maine under the operation of the interstate-commerce law. Our sheriff in York County seized some liquor in a freight car at the Biddeford Station, and he was obliged to restore it, because it had not been constructively delivered. More, the wholesale liquor houses in Massachusetts sued the sheriffs in our State for interfering with the transportation of liquors. Our sheriff was defended by the State attorney general and had to expend $300 of his own money in protecting himself.

Mr. CARLIN. What is the condition there with reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors?

Mr. BERRY. Liquor is being sold there in eight of the counties because of arrangements made with outside liquor houses.

Mr. CARLIN. I wanted to get at that condition.

Mr. BERRY. Eight counties have complete enforcement.

Mr. CARLIN. They have eight counties there in which you say liquor is sold? You mean at retail?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLIN. Isn't that in violation of your State law?

Mr. BERRY. The situation is this: A sheriff is hired by a wholesale liquor house outside the State to permit the importation of its liquor, and is paid on beer $1 a barrel. Now, we can not deal with the sheriff except it is done by impeachment, and we can not impeach.

Mr. CARLIN. Do you mean to say you have legal proof of contracts of that sort?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir. We have no possible way of removing the sheriff.

Mr. MOON. I live in Maine in the summer, and I saw statements in the Boston World that in Portland there were 50 places where liquor was being sold openly.

Mr. BERRY. Because of the reasons I have just stated.

Mr. MOON. Why can not that man be indicted? Why can not they indict him and send him to jail?

Mr. BERRY. For the simple reason that the officers are in collusion with them, and all exercise of legal authority has to be through the officers.

Mr. MOON. You can indict the man.

Mr. BERRY. On what grounds can we indict him?

Mr. MOON. For violation of the law.

Mr. BERRY. On what evidence?

Mr. MOON. I have gone right to the station there, and I have seen beer drunk as openly as in Washington. I do not drink it myself, and I do not visit these places, but I am told they are just as open, bold, and flagrant there as they are here.

Mr. BERRY. That is not true, sir——

Mr. MOON. I am inclined to think that it is absolutely true that the places are right there.

Mr. BERRY. Liquor is sold there, but a man stands on watch outside with a press button in his hand to notify the persons within if an officer comes.

Mr. MCCOY. Why don't they elect another sheriff? Is there nobody in Portland who would enforce the law?

Mr. BERRY. We work by parties, you know—political manipulations. Why don't they enforce the brothel law in Washington? You have your red-light district; why don't you take care of it?

Mr. MCCOY. I think it ought to be taken care of, but that has nothing to do with your failure to enforce the law in Maine.

The fact is that in parts of Maine the voters are absolutely opposed to the prohibition law, and no one who had pledged himself to the enforcement of that law could succeed as a candidate for office.

Let us see what the conditions are in Tennessee, where they have practically a prohibition law. Mr. Carre, president of the Tennessee Anti-Saloon League, described the conditions in his State in part as follows:

That brings on the condition which I desire, in a measure, to indicate to you. I feel sure it will be a rather startling proposition. We have, for example, in Knoxville anywhere from 25 to 50 Federal licensed, open saloons. We have in Chattanooga anywhere from 50 to 100. We had in the city of Nashville until recently——

Mr. CARLIN. You mean within 4 miles of the schoolhouse?

Mr. CARRE. Yes, sir. We had in the city of Nashville until a few months ago over 400 Federal licenses and open saloons—the same saloons that operated before the law went into effect, and operating exactly in the same way; and in the city of Memphis we have anywhere from 500 to 800 Federal licenses.

It is this condition of lawlessness, gentlemen, that I want to bring to your attention from the State of Tennessee. The mayor of our city, the police force, the sheriff, the judge of our criminal court, and the prosecuting attorney are all impervious to any appeal whatever from the citizens to give them relief from such a condition. The mayor, in his first campaign, stated, by his own signature, that if elected he would enforce that law. After two years, having become emboldened in the art of misrule, he declared openly that if he were elected he would not enforce this State law.

Hence the State of Tennessee is powerless at the present to enforce the law under these conditions, and the governor of the State, on Thanksgiving Day, called a conference of citizens from all quarters of the State. There were from 300 to 500 men present to consider what could be done. He appointed a legal commission of 15 men, and that commission has reported that the governor is without power to enforce the laws of the State, and they furthermore say that the constitution——

Mr. CARLIN. They did not report that the local Commonwealth attorneys did not have the power to enforce the laws?

Mr. CARRE. I beg your pardon.

Mr. CARLIN. They did not report that the local Commonwealth attorneys did not have the power to enforce the laws, did they?

Mr. CARRE. Not that they did not have the power, but that they were not doing it, and the commission has said that the constitution has not contemplated such a condition as we now have and has not vested the governor with such power, and that the legislature has not confronted or has not presupposed these conditions. The point I want to bring to your attention—and then I am about through—is that we pray for some relief from these intolerable conditions. Our people want this law, but the conditions are such that many of them are discouraged, and our courts are being debauched, our officials are becoming perjured—I might almost use the word—well, I will not use it; they are perjured men, and we to-day are suffering under these intolerable conditions.

Mr. HOWLAND. How is the Federal Government to blame for that?

Mr. CARRE. How is that?

Mr. HOWLAND. How is the Federal Government to blame for that?

Mr. CARRE. The conditions depicted in the indictment of the two railroads that I referred to, I think, answer your question—if it were not for those interstate shipments. We have forbidden the manufacture of the liquor; we have forbidden the sale of the liquor; but it is imported into our territory from without and sold.

Mr. CARLIN. How many moonshiners have been indicted in Tennessee?

Mr. CARRE. I can not give you the number; not many.

Mr. CARLIN. This bill will not reach them, and if you have that condition existing among your public officials, it seems to me almost unbelievable.

Mr. CARRE. It is.

Mr. CARLIN. It must be because public sentiment there is justifying it.

Mr. CARRE. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. CARLIN. It is not the fault of the law, because you have enacted sufficient statutes.

Mr. CARRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLIN. And your people elect the officials?

Mr. CARRE. I will answer your first question with reference to the "wild-cat" distillers, that they do not trouble us one particle. They just have little places up in the mountains which are very small, which do a 1-gallon business.

Now I come to the answer of your second question. It is not the fact that our people are not interested in this question, but that the liquor forces are concentrating their wealth in our State at every election and are forcing into office by unprincipled methods officials who will do their bidding after they get into office.

Mr. CARLIN. They could only do that by the votes of your own people.

Mr. CARRE. That is true, by the purchased vote; and at the last municipal election it is understood that at least $8,000 was spent in the city of Nashville in the settlement of poll taxes alone by the liquor people.

You will say it is our business to correct that evil, and I grant you that; but I also contend that it is unfair on the part of the Federal Government to force us to such extraordinary legislation and almost impossible effort to accomplish this result against unmeasured wealth which confronts us in these elections. If the Federal Government throws that challenge down to us, if the Federal Government, having been apprised of these facts, says to a struggling State like Tennessee, "Sink or swim," we will have to meet the issue, gentlemen.

Mr. CARLIN. Let me ask you this question: If this legislation you are asking for should prove to be constitutional and operative, would it not have to be enforced by the very officials of whom you are complaining?

Mr. CARRE. That is true, but——

Mr. CARLIN. And if you have that condition existing among your officials, men who have sworn to execute the laws and who will not do it, this statute may not give you any relief.

Mr. CARRE. I will answer that question this way: It will give us an objective, in the first place, toward which to work. As it has already been brought out in these hearings, there are many citizens who feel that if we had the protection of the Federal Government we could move on to the completion of this work.

Mr. CARLIN. The only protection asked for here is that the State laws may be operative——

Mr. CARRE. I understand.

Mr. CARLIN. So far as interstate shipments are concerned——

Mr. CARRE. I understand.

Mr. CARLIN. The right of seizure would be in the hands not of the Federal officials, but in the hands of the State officers—in the hands of the very men you are complaining of.

Mr. DODDS. Would you get any more with this law in effect than with your State law?

Mr. CARRE. I think we would; and that is the second point I want to come to, and that is by extra effort we could begin to make encroachments upon these officials, and as soon as the law began to be operative we would begin to that extent to cut off the revenue from the outside distillers and brewers of the United States, and their interest in Tennessee would be that much diminished, and their slush fund would eventually be cut off, and if the slush fund from the brewers and distillers were cut off we could handle the elections and put in officers who would enforce the law.

Mr. CARLIN. Do your grand juries indict these men?

Mr. CARRE. No, sir; they will not. We have had citizens—professors, doctors, lawyers—all leading citizens of the city, 20 or 30 or 40, who went out and bought liquor and went before the grand jury, and the grand jury turned the whole thing down. We had 60 or 70 warrants sworn out; we had the testimony taken down stenographically and turned in to the grand jury, and it has never been heard from to this day; and that grand jury, I want to call your attention, gentlemen, is appointed man by man by the judge himself, and he can remove every last one of them if he so desires.

Mr. CARLIN. If you changed your laws so that your grand juries were drawn as they are in many other States—from the citizens promiscuously—would not that, at least, give you the opportunity for a grand jury that would indict?

Mr. CARRE. It would not, because we have that law everywhere else in the State except Nashville, and the conditions are worse at Memphis than they are there.

Mr. CARLIN. Do you mean to say that you have not drawn even by accident a grand jury that will indict?

Mr. CARRE. No, sir; a few cases have been indicted in Chattanooga, but by one method and another those men have been kept off of the "road" thus far.

Mr. CARLIN. You can not get trial except through indictment?

Mr. CARRE. That is what we know.

Mr. CARLIN. And your primary trouble is that the grand jury, which is composed entirely of your own citizens, will not indict?

Mr. CARRE. That is made up that way.

Mr. CARLIN. In those cases where it is not made up, but is drawn from the citizens?

Mr. CARRE. I am not an expert in the making of juries.

Mr. DAVIS. Is your judge an elective officer?

Mr. CARRE. Yes; he is. In this instance he was not elected, but he was appointed by Gov. Patterson to fill out an unexpired term. He comes up for election by primary on the 14th of this month.

Mr. DODDS. How long has this condition of affairs existed?

Mr. CARRE. How is that?

Mr. DODDS. How long has this condition of affairs existed?

Mr. CARRE. Since the 14th of July.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, just as a passing remark I want to say that I have not had any opportunity to ascertain conditions such as Dr. Carre mentioned here.

Mr. CARLIN. I do state that it is startling—certainly it is to me, and I did not think such a condition existed anywhere in this country.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. There are many places to be found in this country where there is difficulty in getting officers of the law to do their full duty with respect to the liquor traffic where it exists illegally within their own jurisdiction, because of the fact that whenever interstate shipments are involved they are absolutely powerless to get control of the liquors prior to their unlawful sale, except by the very hard operations that have been named here this morning—clandestine operations.

Mr. CARLIN. In this case saloons seem to be in open operation on the public highway in violation of the law.

Mr. DINWIDDIE. That I do not contend for at all; that is a matter, in my judgment, absolutely within the purview of the State authority, and I think that a State that permits those kind of conditions has to suffer the consequences.

Of course Mr. Carre was inaccurate in speaking of "Federal licenses." The Federal Government does not license anybody to sell liquor, but merely imposes an excise tax on the occupation of selling—only the States grant licenses.

Witnesses from other States admitted a condition of nonenforcement rather than one of inability to enforce.

Illicit distilling is on the increase, particularly in many of those States from which the agitators for this sort of legislation come, States that are supposed to be wholly or partially "dry." Here are the figures.

The number of illicit distilleries seized by the Federal officials was:

1909	1,743
1910	1,911
1911	2,471
1912	2,466

Of the whole number seized in 1912—2,466—1,407 were seized in the States of Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia.

CHARACTER BUILDING, NOT PROHIBITION, IS THE SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM.

With those who believe that the use of alcoholic liquor as a beverage is morally wrong there can be no controversy. One who sincerely entertains such views is entitled to have them respected and given proper consideration, provided always that such person is willing to respect different views sincerely held.

The situation is otherwise, however, with regard to those who do not object to the proper use of alcoholic liquors by others, and especially if they are themselves users of it. With such persons it is proper to argue that prohibition does not prohibit, that it leads to worse conditions than does a regulated traffic in such liquors, and that a more certain and permanent—in fact, the only certain and permanent—eradication of the evils resulting from the indulgence in alcoholic stimulants—if indeed they ever can be entirely eradicated—will come from personal education in regard to the evils complained of, an education that shall convince the individual that he is harmed. When such an individual is convinced that he is harmed and ceases to use alcoholic liquor entirely or becomes a moderate user of it, a result has been achieved that no prohibition law can ever bring about. The experience of the ages proves this.

Let us see what some of the results are where people are taught to use wine in moderation.

Mr. Sbarboro representing the grape growers and the Italian-Swiss colony of California appeared before the committee in opposition to the bill and placed in the record letters from United States consuls in regard to conditions in several foreign countries. Here are some of them:

AMERICAN EMBASSY,
Rome, October 21, 1908.

CAV. ANDREA SBARBORO,
President Manufacturers' and Producers' Association, of California, Rome.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request for my observations as to drunkenness among the people of Italy, and of the city of Rome in particular, I have pleasure in stating that during my residence in Italy I have seen very few cases of drunkenness.

The people, as a whole, are accustomed to drink wine at their meals, which perhaps prevents them from having a craving for stronger intoxicants.

I am, dear sir, your obedient servant, LLOYD C. GRISCOM.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Florence, Italy, December 26, 1908.

CAV. ANDREA SBARBORO,
Hotel Baglioni, Florence.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry relating to the prevalence of drunkenness in Florence, I can say that I have seen but two or three intoxicated men during my four years' residence here.

Wine is in almost universal use by all classes. At the Gambrinus, a popular café, hundreds gather in the evenings—men, women, and children—drink the light wine and beer of the country, and spend the evenings in a pleasant manner and without disorder, and many of the lunch baskets prepared for little children attending school are provided with a small flask of wine.

Yours, truly, JEROME A. QUAY, Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Naples, Italy, October 9, 1908.

CAV. ANDREA SBARBORO,
Hotel de Londres, Naples.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your verbal inquiry of this morning, I am happy to be able to tell you that drunkenness is almost unknown here. In this great city of 600,000 inhabitants one very seldom sees a person the worse for drink. Wine is taken freely among all classes; most workmen drink from a pint to a quart every day, but there is almost no use of strong liquor.

I have lived nearly eight years in Italy and have seen very few drunken men during that time.

Very truly, yours, C. S. CROWNINSHIELD, American Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Milano, Italy, October 28, 1908.

CAV. ANDREA SBARBORO,
President Manufacturers' and Producers' Association, California, Hotel Cavour, Milan.

MY DEAR MR. SBARBORO: With reference to your interesting booklet and to the conversation which I enjoyed with you at the Hotel Cavour to-day, I take great pleasure in saying to you in writing what I at that time said by word of mouth. In the four years I have been stationed here I have seen but two cases of intoxication in the streets of Milan; both of these were on holidays, and neither case exhibited anything more than a slightly accentuated good nature. It would be entirely within my conception of the truth to say that drunkenness is unknown in Milan.

Yours, very truly, JAMES E. DUNNING,
Consul of the United States.

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
Palermo, Italy, December 18, 1908.

CAV. ANDREA SBARBORO,
Hotel Trinacria, Palermo.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation of this morning, I have to say that my experience of many years in Italy and southern France, where the native wines form a regular part of the repasts of the inhabitants, is that drunkenness in these countries is of most rare occurrence. The use of such wines would seem to fill the need felt by many for a light stimulating, or fortifying, beverage and not to lead to a craving for alcohol or to other baneful extremes. Here in Sicily, while the people no doubt have their faults, it is a pleasure to witness their general temperate habits. Even the usual place where drinks are publicly sold is most often a pasticceria, cake shop, or a pleasant café, which the most respectable persons, including ladies and children, may freely enter. There are no screens put up, there is no concealment of the interior or the inmates, for nothing takes place there requiring concealment. The drinking saloon, in an offensive sense, can hardly be said to exist at all.

I beg to remain, very truly, yours,

WILLIAM HENRY BISHOP.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Kehl, Baden, Germany, December 19, 1908.

GRAPE GROWERS OF CALIFORNIA,
460 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of December 1 and willingly place at your disposal the results of my observation of the wine-drinking habits of this part of Germany.

As you are aware Alsace-Lorraine is by far the most important wine producing portion of the German Empire, and naturally wine is the universal drink of the people. This is not so markedly the case in Strassburg, the capital, where the population includes very many Germans—therefore beer drinkers—as well as the native Alsatians. Even in Strassburg, however, wine may be described as the daily drink of the people; even the poorest house has its cask of red wine in the cellar. I have no statistics at hand, but I can say that drunkenness is here a rare offense.

Outside of this city the consumption of beer is trifling and wine is the invariable accompaniment of the midday and evening meals. The wine flask is quite as familiar a feature of the table in Alsace-Lorraine as the water bottle is in the United States. At hotels and boarding houses a half pint of wine is usually supplied without extra charge. In the cafés and restaurants, between meals and in the evenings, wine is constantly drunk, costing only about 19 cents per quart. It is a matter of common knowledge that the people of Alsace-Lorraine are a careful, industrious, and particularly sober community. The spectacle of a person overcome with liquor is so unusual as to excite amusement rather than the disgust which is aroused where such exhibitions are unhappily familiar.

The foregoing remarks apply in a lesser degree to Baden, where much wine is grown and much consumed.

I am, yours, very truly, CARL W. SMITH,
American Vice Consul (in charge).

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Algiers, Algeria, April 15, 1909.

H. F. STOLL, Esq.,
Secretary Grape Growers of California, San Francisco.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of March 20, 1909, and have pleasure in adding my testimony to that of your other correspondents, as to the beneficial effects from a temperance point of view of the regular consumption of light wine as a beverage.

In this colony everyone, from the child just weaned, drinks wine at every meal, and drunkenness is practically unknown. Of course an exception must be made for a large port like Algiers, but even here it is quite a rare event to see a man the worse for liquor.

Very truly, yours, JAMES JOHNSTON,
American Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Teneriffe, February 19, 1909.

H. F. STOLL, Esq.,
Secretary Grape Growers of California, 460 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 14th ultimo, requesting me to inform you about wine drinking and other conditions in re to wine, I have the pleasure to give you my personal knowledge and observation about the universal drinking of wine in the Canary Islands. During my nine years (although myself being an abstainer) I have not seen more than a dozen under the influence of wine or liquor. All saloons, cafés, restaurants, and hotels are open Sundays and every other day; other business is prohibited on Sundays.

The Canary Islands have been known for many centuries for their excellent wine. In 1679 King Charles II issued a proclamation, giving the selling price of wine in England, among which is mentioned Canary Sack; for this wine the highest price was obtained.

In this country, on account of the food not having enough substance and the greater part of the inhabitants being "Anemicos," all the doctors recommend wine to be taken with all meals, more especially foreigners. The children receive wine with their food, of course, this mixed with water, according to the age of the children. I give my own children, ages 4 and 6 years, every noon meal a quarter of a glass of wine mixed with three-quarters water, to give them blood, and myself, although an abstainer, have been ordered at present time by my doctor to drink a glass of wine at every meal, as my blood was becoming too thin, and since I have been taking same I find a great improvement in my health.

As to your request for reports, I respectfully refer you to the Department of State—a report that I transmitted from here on May 27, 1907, headed "The wine trade in Teneriffe." The same has been published, and on application, no doubt, copies will be furnished to you. I would kindly request that you send me a copy, as the one I had has gone astray.

Hoping these few remarks will be satisfactory to you, I am,

Yours, very truly, SOLOMON BERLINER,
American Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Madrid, Spain, February 5, 1909.

H. F. STOLL, Esq.,
Secretary Grape Growers of California,
460 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 15th ultimo, I am to-day mailing a copy of the "Estadistica de las producciones viticola y elevarera." which may interest you.

The drinking of wine at meals here is universal, and, like France, Germany, and Italy, there is practically no drunkenness.

I am, respectfully, yours,

R. W. BARTKEMANN,
American Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Marseille, February 4, 1909.

THE GRAPE GROWERS OF CALIFORNIA,
460 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of the 16th instant, and am of the opinion that you would receive information more of the nature that you are seeking from one of the wine-growing centers of France than from Marseille. In fact, a letter from this point would not at all meet your wishes, as Marseille is a large seaport town, with a very mixed population, and the number of drinking bars where strong liquors are sold, perhaps as much as wine, is a fact that is not infrequently commented on. Without hesitation, however, I may say that in sections of France which I have visited, which are distinctly wine-producing sections, the sight of an intoxicated person is infrequent.

I am sending your letter to our consul at Bordeaux, as the conditions of that center of wine industry are much nearer those regarding which your inquiry is made.

Respectfully,

HORACE LEE WASHINGTON,
American Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
Seville, Spain, February 20, 1909.

H. F. STOLL, Esq.,
Grape Growers of California,
460 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

SIR: I take pleasure in acknowledging your letter of January 15, 1909, with cutting of your article from the San Francisco Chronicle and prospectus of the grape growers of California, both of which I have read with interest. I note also your questions regarding wine drinking, etc., and think that these can perhaps best be answered separately, as follows:

(1) The extent of the vineyards in the Province of Seville may be gathered from the fact that they consist of some 15,000 hectares (1 hectare is equal to 2.471 acres) of vines, all of the white grape. A considerable amount of damage has been done by the Phylloxera, but this is being rectified with American vine stocks.

(2) There is a very extensive treatise on the growing of grapes and making wines in Spain, entitled "Enciclopedia de Viticultura y Vinicultura."

(3) Wine drinking may be considered as a universal habit through Spain, or certainly Andalusia.

(4) Drunkenness does not exist on any great scale; on the contrary, it may be regarded as distinctly limited in its range. This may be attributed to the fact that wine is the ordinary beverage instead of spirits and the like, the effects of wine drinking being much less harmful. It may be also remarked that those who drink nothing but wine, even in the cases of drunkards, are long lived and do not contract those diseases which are associated with other forms of alcohol drinking.

Trusting that you will find this information of service to you,

I am, dear sir, yours, very truly,

LOUIS J. ROSENBERG.
American Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Genoa, Italy, November 4, 1908.

CAV. ANDREA SBARBORO,
Presidente Banca Italo-Americana,
Hotel Bristol, San Francisco, Cal.

SIR: Referring to our very pleasant conversation this morning, in which you requested an expression of my opinion as to the prevalence of drunkenness in Italy, I do not hesitate to say that a 10 years' experience in this country, and a careful observation of the habits of the people, has convinced me that drunkenness is exceedingly rare. So much so is this the case that I do not remember to have seen a dozen Italians who were obviously intoxicated during all the time I have lived in Italy. This condition prevails in spite of the fact that the very large majority of Italians habitually drink the light wines of their country at their meals. Accustomed to wine from early childhood, the Italians use it moderately as a mildly stimulating beverage. So used, I can not discover that it produces harmful results.

I remain, respectfully,

JAS. A. SMITH, Consul General.

HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S CONSULATE,
Venice, December 29, 1908.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the conversation which has passed between you and me this morning, I have the pleasure to state that cases of intoxication are very rare in this district, as the people generally drink the light wine of the country.

Believe me to be, yours, very truly,

EDW. DE ZUCCATO.

Here is some additional evidence offered by Mr. Sbarboro:

133 EAST THIRTY-FIFTH STREET,
March 13, 1908.

MY DEAR SIR: Although I believe in temperance, I try to be temperate in my belief and sufficiently radical not to defeat the ends of my conservatism. I am warmly in sympathy with you in the attitude which you take in regard to wine as a substitute for whisky. Judging from what I see in this country and from what I know of the conditions of things in Europe, which I have visited 25 times, I am decidedly of the opinion that the more wine there is produced in this country and the more freely it is transported from State to State, the less whisky will be used and the smaller the amount of drunkenness. If the proposed bill is passed, I earnestly trust that exception will be made of beverages containing less than a certain fixed maximum of alcohol.

Wishing you the largest success in your propagation of the views which you so interestingly and persuasively expressed to me a couple of days since, I am,

Yours, very sincerely,

C. H. PARKHURST.

CAV. ANDREA SBARBORO, Waldorf Astoria, New York City.

CALIFORNIA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
San Francisco, Cal., November 22, 1905.

Mr. A. SBARBORO,
460 Montgomery Street.

MY DEAR MR. SBARBORO: In your paper entitled "Wine or tea, that is the question," you expressed sentiments which I have been advocating for years. If the people of this country were educated from babyhood up to drink wine, alcoholism would be a rare disease, as has been proven in wine-drinking countries. It is the forbidden fruit that tempts. In my experience in families where the wine flows freely drunkards are the exception, whereas many of the offspring of teetotalers and wine abhorrers who have not tasted alcoholics until they almost have grown to be men become drunkards. It would be interesting to compare the statistics of drunkards in wine and beer drinking countries with those of England and America. Hoping that you will further pursue this question and that I may be able to assist you in an humble way,

I remain, truly, yours,

MARTIN REGENSBURGER.

William R. Wheeler, formerly Labor Commissioner of the United States, wrote Mr. Sbarboro as follows:

ALPINE, CAL., May 12, 1908.

Mr. A. SBARBORO,
Italian-American Bank, San Francisco.

MY DEAR MR. SBARBORO: I am particularly grateful to you for having inclosed your very able article on the subject of "True temperance," upon which I had already read so many favorable comments. I well recall your request that while in Italy I make particular effort to spy out drunken men. I am glad to state that, much to my surprise, during the entire month which I spent there I did not see one drunken man, notwithstanding the fact that wine is the national beverage and universally consumed. This confirmed the opinion previously conceived, that Italy is, in truth, a temperance country. I myself am a strong believer in, and practitioner of, temperance, but not prohibition. The great trouble with many well-meaning people in our country is that they do not discriminate between the two. I assure you, my dear Mr. Sbarboro, that you shall at all times have my cooperation in your good work of preaching "the gospel of the grape."

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. R. WHEELER.

Mr. Sbarboro said, among other things:

Let me tell you this about the mayor of London. I was very much impressed with the recent statement of Sir Thomas Boor Crosby, the lord mayor of London, who, when he presided at a conference of the National Temperance League, insisted strongly upon moderation in the use of alcoholic drinks. He stated that compulsory abstinence was not the way to win the world to the side of temperance. Although he is in his eighty-second year, he says he takes a moderate amount of alcohol every day, and he calls that "temperance."

I am, myself, over 72 years of age. I have been drinking wine at my meals since I was a baby. I do not know what intoxication is, and, as you see, wine has not affected my health very much.

To prove to you further, gentlemen, that I practice what I preach, I will tell you also that I am the father of five children, all born in San Francisco, and that every one of them as soon as they could sit at the table in their baby chair was given a litle wine and water by their mother. These children are now grown up. The three boys are employed in important financial institutions, and the two girls are married and have children of their own, who are being brought up in the same manner. My children and grandchildren have used wine at their meals every day of their lives, except in sickness. They do not know what intoxication is, and if they live as long as Methuselah, I assure you that they never will. What a great blessing it would be to the American people if they all could say the same of their children.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] in his speech to-day went to the bottom of the matter. The principal cause of the evils connected with use of alcoholic liquor is the bad social conditions existing in this country. If the money spent and the efforts expended in the agitation that has been carried on in favor of so-called prohibition laws and against the saloon had been spent and expended in a persistent effort to improve social conditions this country would be a vastly better one than it is now, and we should not now be considering the Webb bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I can not, of course, in the limited time remaining for debate add much to the discussion which has been had. But in closing the debate on this bill I desire to say that some gentlemen mistake the purpose of this legislation. The purpose is to take the protecting arm of the Federal Government, by virtue of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, from around the illicit dealers in liquors, and is to allow the States which have passed police regulations restricting or forbidding the sale of liquor to better enforce those regulations. If any man should ask how this bill can contribute to that end, let me answer by saying it will permit the State to seize such liquor intended to be sold or otherwise used in violation of law before it reaches the hands of the consignee. In Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) the case of Pierce v. New Hampshire (5 How., 554) was expressly overruled. It was held that the law of Iowa prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors except for pharmaceutical purposes, under a license, was unconstitutional when applied to the sale by the importer of liquor in the original package, such liquors having been manufactured in and brought from another State. This case overturned the doctrine in Pierce against New Hampshire, which had been supposed for 50 years to be the law. Prior to the decision in Leisy against Hardin, no one believed that the consignee had the right to sell intoxicating liquors shipped from one State into another in violation of the police regulations of the State to which they were shipped. To avoid the effect of the decision in that case and to remove the obstacle resulting from the exclusive control of Congress over commerce among the States preventing the full operation and effect of police regulations of the States in regard to intoxicating liquors, Congress passed the Wilson law, the act of August 8, 1890. It was there enacted, using the language of Chief Justice Fuller in Leisy against Hardin, "simply to remove an impediment to the enforcement of the State laws in respect to imported packages in the original condition, created by the absence of a specific utterance on the part of Congress"; in other words, this act was in pursuance of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and was held not to be a delegation of power to the States, but the exercise by Congress of the power confided to Congress by the Constitution. It is not disputed that Congress can not delegate a power to the States, and it is well established that any act of Congress which invades the reserved police power of the State under a mere pretext that interstate commerce may in some way be affected, is without constitutional authority and void.

In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1) Chief Justice Marshall declared in substance that while Congress can not enable a State to legislate, it may even go so far as to adopt the provision of a State on any subject, such as pilotage and the like.

Congress has passed laws requiring the Federal courts to conform in practice and procedure to the rules of the State courts.

In the United States v. Forty-three Gallons of Whisky (93 U. S., 188) the Supreme Court declared:

Congress, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, but extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by the Indians.

It would be strange indeed if the commercial power lodged solely with Congress, and unrestrained as it is by State lines, did not extend to the exclusion of spirituous liquors intended to corrupt the Indians, not only from the existing Indian country, but from that which has ceased to be so.

In the Rahrer case, Chief Justice Fuller says:

"By the adoption of the Constitution the ability of the several States to act upon the matter solely in accordance with their own will was extinguished, and the legislative will of the General Government substituted. No affirmative guaranty was hereby given to any State of the right to demand, as between it and the others, what it could not have obtained before; while the object was undoubtedly sought to be attained of preventing commercial regulations partial in their character or contrary to the common interests. And the magnificent growth and prosperity of the country attest the success which has attended the accomplishment of that object. But this furnishes no support to the position that Congress could not, in the exercise of the discretion reposed in it, concluding that the common interests did not require entire freedom in the traffic in ardent spirits, enact the law in question."

In 1895 Congress enacted a law prohibiting the transmission in interstate commerce of all lottery tickets, and the Supreme Court upheld the validity of such law. The court says:

"We are of the opinion that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic and, therefore, are subjects of commerce, and the regulation of the carriage of such tickets, from State to State, at least by independent carriers, is a regulation of commerce among the several States.

"But it is said that the statute in question does not 'regulate' the carrying of lottery tickets from State to State, but by punishing those who cause them to be so carried Congress, in effect, prohibits such carrying.

"It is said in effect (by Congress) that it would not permit the declared policy of the States which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce. Congress alone has the power to occupy by legislation the whole field of interstate commerce. What was said by this court on a former occasion may well be here repeated.

"The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of the subject matter specifically committed to its charge. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545.)
